UNBREAKABLE VOWS: SAME-SEX MARRIAGE AND THE FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT TO DIVORCE

MEG PENROSE*

First comes love, then comes marriage.
Then comes divorce.¹

I. INTRODUCTION—LOVE AND MARRIAGE

A 155. C668. To many readers these are mere numbers. But, to same-sex couples that have waited years to solemnize their relationships, these simple numbers have opened up a variety of rights and obligations. Finally, same-sex couples can stand in line in New York, pull a number, and for all intents and purposes be just like every other consenting, non-incestuous couple in love.² These couples can now legally wed and, in states like New York, tap into many of the benefits that marriage affords.³ Marriage, after all, affords well over 1,100 federal rights.⁴ Marriage like-

She also thanks James Mitchell and the “Great State of New York” for its forward thinking approach toward marriage. While any errors in form or substance are the author’s alone, this Article has greatly benefitted from thoughtful comments provided by Professor Mark Tushnet, Professor Herma Hill Kay, Professor Bernie James, Professor Judith Stinson, Professor Morgan L. Holcomb, Professor Robert Spector, and Karen Stevens, as well as exceptional research assistance from wonderful librarians, including Kris Helge and Laura McKinnon. Professor Eugene Volokh, Professor Michael Dorf, and Dean Erwin Chemerinsky also contributed early guidance that helped shape the piece. Special credit also goes to my colleagues, Professors Sahar Aziz, Michael Green, Peter Reilly, and Timothy Mulvaney. 3. See Kate Taylor, Over 10,000 Licenses Issued in First Year of Gay Marriage, N.Y. TIMES, July 25, 2012, at A22 (remarking that number of same-sex couples marrying might actually be higher because applicants are not required to report their sex on marriage applications). As many as 42% of total same-sex marriages performed in New York during the first year of legalized marriage came from outside New York. Id. Approximately 35% of these couples returned home to other states in the U.S. Id.

4. See Letter from the GAO to Senator Bill Frist (Jan. 23, 2004) (identifying total of 1,138 federal marital benefits as of December 31, 2003). An earlier GAO Letter to Representative Henry Hyde had identified 1,049 federal laws where benefits were tied to legal marriage. See Letter from the GAO to the Honorable Henry J. Hyde (Jan. 31, 1997). These rights include federal tax benefits, social security benefits, employment benefits, medical benefits, death benefits, housing benefits, wise provides numerous state rights and benefits.⁵ But one right that remains elusive to most same-sex couples is the right to divorce.⁶

For those that travel to partake of the right to marry in states like New York or Massachusetts, returning home does not afford the same rights of marriage dissolution that other non-gay couples enjoy.⁷ Ironically, in states like Texas and Rhode Island, gay couples that are legally married outside the state return home to be forever legally bound by their out-of-state marriage, something non-gay couples never fear . . . or face.⁸

This Article considers whether there is a fundamental constitutional right, through the liberty component of substantive due process, to divorce.⁹ This right to divorce becomes particularly important for same-sex couples whose marital rights are incomplete, at best.¹⁰ Surely, if divorce were outlawed by any state, the masses would rise up against such tyranny with cries that divorce must be constitutionally protected.¹¹ But place di-and other legal benefits and protections including the right to sue for wrongful death, the right to claim marital privilege under evidentiary rules, and protections afforded for domestic crimes and violence. Id.

8. See Stinson, supra note 6, at 448 (“[T]he vast majority of married couples in the United States can exit their marriage with relative ease. Yet divorce is often impossible to obtain in a growing number of cases—those where the two parties involved in the divorce are of the same gender.”).

10. Curiously, the United States House of Representatives found that securing traditional marriage against the rising tide of divorce was less imperative than protecting marriage against same-sex infiltration. See H.R. REP. 104-664, at 14 (1996). In summarizing the governmental interests necessitating DOMA, the House Committee acknowledged that “it will be objected that there are greater threats to marriage and families than the one posed by same-sex ‘marriage,’ the most prominent of which is divorce. There is great force in this argument” Id.

11. See, e.g., GLENDA RILEY, DIVORCE: AN AMERICAN TRADITION 32 (1991) (tracing history of divorce in early American life and culture). Americans, as early as the 1700s, “maintained that one party could flee from another if their union lacked fulfillment and happiness. Divorce-seekers also employed such terms as ‘tyranny,’ ‘misrule,’ ‘injustice,’ and ‘happiness of the individual,’ while espousing revolution against unjust rule by a spouse.” Id. Early sentiments toward divorce often aligned with the revolutionary spirit found in the Declaration of Independence. Id. at 31. Professor Riley explains that Thomas Jefferson “related the concepts of independence and happiness with divorce some years before he presented a similar argument for terminating America’s connection with England in the Declaration of Independence.” Id.

orce in the context of same-sex marriage and the response is predictably more tepid. “Those” marriages are not legal anyway, so what harm is there in excluding them from divorce?¹² States that refuse to recognize same-sex marriage, for benefits purposes, can arguably refuse to recognize such marriage even for the limited purpose of divorce—which requires, as a predicate, a lawful marriage.¹³ This approach fails to appreciate the integral nature of divorce to marriage.

When marriages fail, as they have since the founding of our nation,¹⁴ people exercise their right to divorce and move on to new, healthier, happier relationships.¹⁵ Nearly 5,000 divorces are granted daily in the United States.¹⁶ The reality remains that many Americans are married more than once in their lives.¹⁷ Many individuals seize this opportunity on multiple occasions,¹⁸ perhaps growing more convinced in their forever vows with each subsequent marriage.¹⁹ But, can a state outlaw divorce and hold in-

17. See RILEY, supra note 11, at 173. Professor Riley notes that many famous Americans have had multiple marriages. For example, Rita Hayworth, Richard Pryor, Jane Wymann, and Tammy Wynette all had five marriages. Id. Muhammad Ali, Glen Campbell, Johnny Carson, Joan Collins, Doris Day, Kenny Rogers, and Frank Sinatra were all married four times. dividuals to their initial promise to the state and each other to be legally bound 'til death do they part? Or, does the United States Constitution afford relief from marriage for changed circumstances, including the simple desire to remarry someone else?

Numerous cases suggest there is a fundamental right to divorce.²⁰ And, from a logical perspective, divorce appears to be an essential corollary of marriage.²¹ Surely the state cannot force individuals to remain legally bound, regardless of the words uttered during marriage ceremonies.²² Marriage, and its bundle of rights, must assuredly include not only an entrance, but also an exit.²³ For many same-sex couples, this traditional exit has been sealed, withheld, or otherwise thwarted.²⁴ Accordingly, same-sex couples must convince courts that divorce is a fundamental right—not a right that states can withhold from discrete or unpopular minorities. The fundamental right to divorce provides the only shelter from imposing unbreakable vows.

Section II of this Article briefly discusses the similarities between interracial and same-sex marriage. Section III exposes the uncertain status of same-sex marriage in relation to divorce. Section IV analyzes how courts define fundamental rights under substantive due process. Finally, Section V applies this analytical framework to conclude divorce is a fundamental right.

States currently have the right to decide whether to sanction gay marriage for purposes relating to marriage and marital benefits. States retain the right to limit marriage within their borders. But, under no circumstances, can any state require a legally married individual to remain married.²⁵ States cannot do so because divorce is qualitatively different from marriage. American divorce dates back to 1639 and has continued unabated, in varying forms and fashions, to provide relief from wedding vows.²⁶ This right cannot be withheld from same-sex couples while generously granted to all others.²⁷ Such disparate treatment is not only unconscionable, it is—this author believes—unconstitutional.

II. UNNATURAL UNIONS

“What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.”²⁸

This common edict, one repeated during many marriage ceremonies, contains the words of Jesus not Jefferson.²⁹ Jefferson, it turns out, was an early and ardent supporter of divorce.³⁰ Many of his colleagues, including Alexander Hamilton, proposed divorce legislation and supported the right for early Americans to exit marriage.³¹ Hamilton’s 1787 proposed New York statute allowing divorce solely on grounds of adultery remained New York’s law until 1966.³² Early Americans became convinced “that divorce was a citizen’s right in a democratic country dedicated to principles of freedom and happiness.”³³

In contrast, marital rights have often been withheld from certain, unpopular groups. Unlike divorce, the fundamental right to marry is of relatively recent origin. The fundamental right to marry, protecting most men marrying most women,³⁴ was not considered enshrined in our fed-

26. See RILEY, supra note 11, at 12 (explaining that while variations for divorce-seekers may have required some Americans to obtain legislative divorces while others sought judicial divorces, divorce has been steadily consumed since the founding of our nation).

27. See Stinson, supra note 6, at 458 (noting that “[i]n the last two decades, some courts have granted divorces in cases where they would not have permitted the marriage in the first place, including common-law marriages [which are not recognized as legal in every state] and marriages of first cousins”).

28. Mark 10:9 (King James).

29. See RILEY, supra note 11, at 31.

30. Id. Jefferson was a staunch supporter of divorce maintaining that to refuse divorce is “to chain a man to misery till death.” Id. He further noted that “liberty of divorce prevents and cures domestic quarrels” and “restores to women their natural right of equality.” Id. Thus, while history credits Jesus with vigorously opposing divorce, the words of Jefferson demonstrate a much more liberated view. Id.

34. Throughout this Article, the author wants to make clear that when describing marriage and its fundamental right, the author intends to mean those legal marriages that are entered by two (and only two) consenting persons of appropriate age, lacking in close or incestuous relation. The United States Supreme Court upheld a bigamy conviction against First Amendment challenge as far back as 1878. See Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 161–68 (1878). Polygamy, the eral Constitution until 1967.³⁵ Its "sacred" pedigree in this country is a mere forty-five years old.³⁶ Compared to divorce, which began in earnest during the colonial period, the right to marry is in its infancy.³⁷ Prior to 1967, states could and, in fact, did prevent many men from marrying many women.³⁸ In particular, interracial marriage was illegal,³⁹ often punished by either prison⁴⁰ or banishment,⁴¹ and deemed void by many of the indi-

Court noted, "has always been odious among the northern and western nations of Europe, and, until the establishment of the Mormon Church, was almost exclusively a feature of the life of Asiatic and of African people." Id. at 164. The Court continued, "we think it may safely be said there never has been a time in any State of the Union when polygamy has not been an offence against society . . ." Id. at 165. While marriage rights and regulations vary from state to state and from generation to generation, there has not been any variation, or diminishment, in the certitude that marriages to multiple partners at one time (bigamy and polygamy) or marriages between close relatives is universally condemned. Id.

35. See Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12 (1967). While Loving invalidated state statutes and proscriptions against interracial marriages, the Supreme Court did not strike down other exclusions against marriage including incest, bigamy, polygamy, and same-sex marriage. Additionally, all states continue to place legislative limitations on marriage relating to age. Prior to Loving, the United States Supreme Court had actually upheld anti-miscegenation statutes against Equal Protection challenges, refusing to overturn the convictions of a black man and white woman for living together in adultery and fornication. See Pace v. Alabama, 106 U.S. 583, 585 (1883), overruled by McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184 (1964).

36. Although the first case to strike down miscegenation laws as violating Equal Protection was decided nearly twenty years before Loving, its holding emanated from the Supreme Court of California, which only bound California. Perez v. Lippold, 198 P.2d 17 (Cal. 1948).

37. See RILEY, supra note 11, at 3 ("American divorce has a long and venerable history: Puritan settlers first introduced it in the American colonies during the early 1600s. The resulting institution of American divorce was vital, and growing, long before late twentieth-century Americans carried it to its current state.").

38. Loving, 388 U.S. at 6-7 & n.5 (listing sixteen states that had miscegenation statutes in effect when Loving was decided as: Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and West Virginia). The Court indicated also that Maryland repealed its miscegenation statute after Loving was initiated. Id. at 6 n.5. The Court also listed fourteen states that had repealed their miscegenation statutes within fifteen years prior to Loving, including Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Indiana, Maryland, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, and Wyoming. Id.

39. See Kimberly A.C. Wilson, Some See Parallels in Gay Marriage Debate, BALTIMORE SUN, Feb. 25, 2004, at 5B (noting that Maryland is credited with first miscegenation law in 1664). "In the earliest days of Maryland history, the person who performed a black-white wedding ceremony could be fined. White servants who married slaves and free Africans who married white servants were enslaved." Id.

40. Jason Thomas, Love Divided, Reunited: Woman Who Gave Up Family to Marry a Black Man Rejoices in Reconnecting with the Sister She'd Left Behind, INDIANAPOLIS STAR, Aug. 25, 2005, at A1. Indiana, which became a state in 1816, began outlawing interracial marriage two years later in 1818. Id. In the early 1900s, the law in Indiana provided that individuals violating the anti-miscegenation laws would be "fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 and imprisoned not less than one year nor more than 10 years." Id.

41. In fact, the Lovings were essentially banished by Virginia when the state trial judge suspended their one-year sentence for twenty-five years on the condi-

vidual states.⁴² Such unions were deemed “unnatural,”⁴³ among other things.⁴⁴ From 1871⁴⁵ to 1928⁴⁶ there were three Joint Resolutions to add a constitutional amendment to prevent interracial marriage.⁴⁷ All three failed but set the stage for later federal attempts, including a failed constitutional amendment, for taking plenary control over marriage and divorce.⁴⁸

Just as interracial marriage was deemed “unnatural” by courts and legislators, the same emotive arguments are advanced to deny martial equality to same-sex couples.⁴⁹ Several members of Congress have explained tion that they “leave the State and not return to Virginia together for 25 years.” Loving, 388 U.S. at 3.

42. Id. at 4–5 n.3 (noting that Virginia statute at issue in Loving established all “marriages between a white person and a colored person shall be absolutely void without any decree of divorce or other legal process”).

43. Representative Seaborn Roddenbery asserted on the Capitol floor that such interracial marriages were “revolting” “villainous” and “atrocious.” See 49 CONG. REC. 502 (1912); see also State v. Ross, 76 N.C. 242, 245 (N.C. 1877) (noting further argument “that a marriage between persons of different races is as unnatural and as revolting as an incestuous one”); Eggers v. Olson, 231 P. 483, 484 (Okla. 1924) (“Statutes forbidding intermarriage by the white and black races were without doubt dictated by wise statesmanship, and have a broad and solid foundation in enlightened policy, sustained by sound reason and common sense. The amalgamation of the races is not only unnatural, but is always productive of deplorable results.”).

44. Brian Powell, Marriage and the Court of Public Opinion, L.A. TIMES, Dec. 5, 2010, at 37. Mr. Powell, a sociologist at Indiana University, indicates that “[t]he justifications now used to renounce same-sex marriage—that it is unnatural and ungodly, that children from such unions will be irrevocably harmed, and that such marriages degrade ‘real’ marriage—mirror objections to interracial marriages”

45. See H.R.J. Res. 368, 62nd Cong. (1912). The Joint Resolution was proffered by Georgia Representative Roddenbery as follows:

Intermarriage between negroes or persons of color and Caucasians or any other character of persons within the United States or any Territory under their jurisdiction is forever prohibited, and the term “negroes” or “persons of color” as here employed shall be held to mean any and all persons of African descent or having any trace of African or negro blood.

Id.

46. See S.J. Res. 65, 70th Cong. (1928). Senator Blease introduced the following Joint Resolution:

The marriage of a white person with a negro or mulatto shall be unlawful and void. Congress shall provide by law for the punishment of parties attempting to contract such marriage, and for the punishment of the officer of the law, or minister or any other person qualified to perform the marriage ceremony, who shall attempt to or perform such ceremony.

48. See, e.g., S.J. Res. 1707, 70th Cong. (1927) which provided a very detailed description of marriage and divorce, including five permissible grounds for divorce: adultery; cruel and inhuman treatment; abandonment or failure to provide for a period of one year or more; incurable insanity; and conviction of an infamous crime.

49. See, e.g., Tim Craig, Competing Md. Measures Would Focus on Gay Rights, WASH. POST., Nov. 20, 2003, at B01 (discussing Maryland legislators’ views on same-their reasons for opposing same-sex marriage in terms, and tones, similar to those raised during the anti-miscegenation period. For example, Representative Thomas Coburn remarked that he opposed gay marriage because it was “based on perversion,” and “unnatural.”⁵⁰ Additionally, Representative Stephen Buyer underscored that same-sex marriages are “an attack upon God’s principles.”⁵¹ Senator Jesse Helms likewise exclaimed that “at the heart of this debate is the moral and spiritual survival of this Nation.”⁵² Similar to the interracial couples that preceded them, same-sex couples find themselves regularly targeted for constitutional amendments to, once again, protect the sanctity of marriage from “unnatural” influences.⁵³

The Supreme Court of Hawaii addressed these vestiges of bigotry in a very direct manner in its 1993 groundbreaking opinion, Baehr v. Lewin.⁵⁴

[T]he Virginia courts declared that interracial marriage simply could not exist because the Deity had deemed such a union intrinsically unnatural, and, in effect, because it had theretofore never been the “custom” of the state to recognize mixed marriages, marriage “always” having been construed to presuppose a different configuration. With all due respect to the Virginia courts of a bygone era, we do not believe that trial judges are the ultimate authorities on the subject of Divine Will, and, as Loving amply demonstrates, constitutional law may mandate, like it or not, that customs change with an evolving social order.⁵⁵

While this Article does not intend to primarily focus on whether there is a constitutional right for same-sex couples to marry, the fact that the foundational arguments against gay marriage are eerily familiar to those opposing miscegenation should be evaluated in assessing state actions withholding marital rights—including, as this Article challenges—the correlative, fundamental right to divorce.⁵⁶

For states whose legislatures eradicated their anti-miscegenation laws prior to Loving v. Virginia,⁵⁷ there remained the thorny issue of whether such interracial marriages would be recognized in neighboring states outlawing such marriages.⁵⁸ What happened when those interracial marriages, generally void under state miscegenation statutes, broke down? Could states that outlawed interracial marriage still force such individuals to remain married despite their deep desires to end the union?

Same-sex couples marrying today are facing the same dilemma. Same-sex couples, legally married in one state, may return home to a faltering marriage and an inhospitable court system.⁵⁹ State courts are beginning to struggle in earnest with the question—both jurisdictional and substantive—of whether they have the power to award same-sex divorce.⁶⁰ The Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) is silent on this issue.⁶¹ While DOMA precludes recognition of same-sex marriages, it does not outlaw or otherwise delimit the right to petition for divorce.⁶² And, as this Article contends, neither DOMA nor any state law could do so without running afoul of the fundamental right of all persons to access the courts for dissolution of a legal marriage.

Curiously, though admittedly not identically, history has a way of repeating itself. For those gay couples that find themselves legally married in New York, what happens when they travel home to Texas? Just as racial minorities experienced prior to Loving, the answer is not entirely clear and the reasoning hardly consistent. Now, in the twenty-first century, the Supreme Court has the inescapable opportunity to firmly declare divorce is a fundamental right.

III. UNCERTAIN STATUS

If there is one thing that the people are entitled to expect from their lawmakers, it is rules of law that will enable individuals to tell whether they are married and, if so, to whom. Today many people who have simply lived in more than one state do not know, and the most learned lawyer cannot advise them with any confidence. The uncertainties that result are not merely technical, nor are they trivial; they affect fundamental rights and relations such as the lawfulness of their cohabitation, their children's legitimacy, their title to property, and even whether they are law-abiding persons or criminals. In a society as mobile and nomadic as ours, such uncertainties affect large numbers of people and create a social problem of some magnitude.⁶³

Most individuals debating the gay marriage issue fail to appreciate that marriage is only part of the equation. Far too often marriage involves not just the "coming together for better or for worse, hopefully enduring," but also the dissolution of the marriage endeavor.⁶⁴ While marriage is usually a joyful occasion, divorce can be life-changing and financially ruinous.⁶⁵ Divorce is not always mutual and frequently not amicable.⁶⁶ It is the rending apart of a union, one that state courts alone can undo.⁶⁷ If this power is withheld, individuals remain married despite changed circumstances and, often, changed addresses.

So how do states treat individuals that leave the state to participate in a destination wedding? Can they return home from Canada, New York, Hawaii, etc., to the protection of divorce, if needed? Without the state sanction of divorce, individuals would remain married to another—at least in certain states and countries where their marriage is deemed lawful—'til death do they part. But, this dilemma only faces some individuals: the same-sex couples that are quickly becoming the Mildred Jeter and Richard Loving of the twenty-first century.⁶⁸

Despite the belief that homosexuals desire marriage equality from purely a status perspective, many gay and lesbian individuals desire marriage for its opposite protection—divorce. If a state refuses to recognize a marital relationship for the limited purpose of divorce, the parties to that relationship have no legal recourse when the feelings fade and the marital framework falls apart.⁶⁹ Marriage provides security precisely because there is protection proffered, in the form of divorce, when that relationship fails. When you get right down to it, the push for marriage is not about marriage at all. It is about divorce. Thus, the dialogue regarding a marital equivalent, such as civil unions, is legally unacceptable.⁷⁰ Without marriage, many courts have found there can be no divorce.⁷¹ And, divorce is a time-honored American tradition that ensures each party is protected when the union fails.⁷²

A. Uncivil Unions

Gay couples that sought out and obtained legal “civil unions” under Vermont state law learned very quickly that those unions could not be easily dissolved.⁷³

Individuals are now bringing these migrating marriages and civil unions to court. They seek divorces, dissolution and . . . benefits. The dissolution cases present the classic conflict-of-laws problem. Parties from a jurisdiction that offers civil unions, [sic] are now domiciled in another state and want to dissolve the relationship.⁷⁴

74. B.S., 883 N.Y.S.2d at 463.

As two scholars aptly noted, these couples are “wedlocked.”⁷⁵ The Supreme Court of New York for Westchester County, a state trial court, found that while “New York courts have recognized same sex [marital] unions celebrated in a sister state or foreign country by application of the principal [sic] of full faith and credit,” “the essential predicate for each judicial determination is the existence of a valid marriage.”⁷⁶ Thus, the New York court, like many other courts dealing with civil unions—which are not marriage relationships—found that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction, or statutory power, to render any dissolution.⁷⁷ Simply put, the couple could not divorce.

During the late 1800s and early 1900s, interracial couples faced a similar problem. Their situation, however, was exacerbated by the virulent nature of racial prejudice. Interracial couples were not only disallowed the martial bond,⁷⁸ they were often subjected to criminal prosecution,⁷⁹ and extra-judicial punishments, for participating in such unions.⁸⁰ Intemperate invectives⁸¹ and rousing language⁸² were, and still are, cast about to ensure that the majoritarian view will hold tightly to its purported God-

B. The Queer Issue of Same-Sex Divorce

In contrast to interracial struggles, perilously bound by criminal decrees and prosecutions, homosexual unions find disdain only at a visceral or religious level.⁸⁸ Since 2003, same-sex couples have enjoyed a constitutionally-protected right to sexual intimacy. Still, same-sex marriage is repulsive to many and the rights relating to traditional marriage, including divorce, are deemed to belong solely and exclusively to the heterosexual community. The public policy rhetoric denouncing same-sex marriage does not explain why individuals, once legally married, should be denied divorce.⁸⁹ Whether the attempted suppression of same-sex divorce is based on the refusal of sister states to provide comity or the DOMA's negation of Full Faith and Credit, same-sex couples find themselves in an untenable position: hopelessly and unyieldingly married for all time. Same-sex couples alone face the realization that their promises of "I do" are unbreakable vows.

The Supreme Court of Wyoming appreciated this dilemma in permitting a same-sex female couple to access divorce despite the lower court's finding that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction over the controversy.⁹⁰ The court explained the critical distinctions between recognizing same-sex marriage in the divorce context and more generally embracing homosexual unions:

Specifically, Paula and Victoria are not seeking to live in Wyoming as a married couple. They are not seeking to enforce any right incident to the status of being married. In fact, it is quite the opposite. They are seeking to dissolve a legal relationship entered into under the laws of Canada. Respecting the law of Canada . . . for the limited purpose of accepting the existence of a condition precedent to granting a divorce, is not tantamount to state recognition of an ongoing same-sex marriage. Thus, the policy of this state against the creation of same-sex marriages is not violated.⁹¹

State courts throughout the country are struggling, as Wyoming did, to apply their divorce paradigm to same-sex marriages. The problem with waiting for states to interpret their divorce laws in this burgeoning arena is that, in the interim, same-sex couples are forced to remain legally wed, thereby denying them the right to re-marry that their heterosexual neighbors enjoy. These couples are denied, forever, their right to access the state court system—a scenario former Chief Justice Rehnquist noted may pose a constitutional violation.⁹²

State court decisions confronting same-sex divorce are not uniform nationally, or even within a single state.⁹³ Some states, like Texas, have issued decisions finding that marriage and divorce are legally inseparable, essentially finding that divorce is a component of marriage.⁹⁴ And, since same-sex marriage is unlawful in Texas, and void as against public policy, divorcing such individuals is impermissible.⁹⁵ Other states, such as Rhode Island, have found that the laws outlining divorce, predicated as they are on the State's marriage laws, "had in mind only marriages between people of different sexes," and thus the state can completely close its doors to same-sex couples seeking marital dissolution.⁹⁶ Finally, a Pennsylvania Court denied access to divorce for a same-sex couple, noting that (1) same-sex marriage is not a fundamental right; and, (2) that these individuals can petition to have their marriage deemed "void"—an inequitable result that is not equivalent to, or engrained with the same protections, as divorce.⁹⁷ These conflicting approaches, particularly the Pennsylvania court's refusal to consider the appropriate fundamental right at stake—divorce, not marriage—merely reinforce the need for consideration of divorce as a fundamental right.⁹⁸

The most recent state court opinion on same-sex divorce is *Port v. Cowan*⁹⁹ from the Court of Appeals of Maryland. The Maryland court found that same-sex divorce is not repugnant to the State's public policy.¹⁰⁰ The court found that based on the doctrine of comity, "long applied in our State, Maryland courts 'will give effect to laws and judicial decisions of another state or jurisdiction, not as a matter of obligation but out of deference and respect.’”¹⁰¹ The decision is instructive in noting the many instances where state courts recognize marriages performed outside their boundaries for divorce purposes that are not legal inside state boundaries, such as common law marriages¹⁰² and even certain incestuous marriages.¹⁰³

The comity argument, limited as it is to judicial discretion as to whether a particular marriage violates public policy, is an insufficient protection for same-sex couples needing divorce.¹⁰⁴ This approach exposes gay couples to the same uncertainties faced by interracial couples before Loving: am I married when I travel or move to another state? More importantly, can I re-marry if I travel or move? The uncertain status of same-sex marriage, being legal in Connecticut, the District of Columbia, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, Vermont, and Washington, is how these legally married individuals will be received in other states, such as Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas, and Wyoming.¹⁰⁵ From what the cases currently reveal, a same-sex couple married in New York could divorce in Wyoming but not Texas.¹⁰⁶ And a couple legally married in Iowa can dissolve that union in Maryland, but not Pennsylvania. This is precisely the scenario that plagued interracial couples for years. It is the very scenario that underscores the importance of the Full Faith and Credit Clause and casts a potential constitutional shadow over DOMA.¹⁰⁷

In each of these instances, the State’s refusal to provide access to divorce for same-sex couples implicates that person’s subsequent right to marry (or re-marry depending on whether the same-sex union would be recognized) under Loving and Zablocki v. Redhail.¹⁰⁸ Imagine, for example, a female who legally married another female in New Hampshire (legal, at least under the laws of New Hampshire) and desires to leave this marriage and enter a new marriage with a male partner in Texas. Her right to marry that male partner is impaired by the State of Texas's refusal to grant her divorce.¹⁰⁹ And, while Texas would gladly "void" the first marriage, such declarations of voidness do not share the full spectrum of rights and privileges as traditional divorce proceedings.¹¹⁰ In the truest sense, voidness declarations are separate but far from equal.¹¹¹ Following Romer v. Evans,¹¹² such disparate treatment may not only be unwise, it is arguably unconstitutional.¹¹³

106. In the heterosexual context, a similar scenario occurred in Haddock v. Haddock, 201 U.S. 562 (1906). Haddock has since been overruled by the United States Supreme Court. Williams v. North Carolina, 317 U.S. 287 (1942).

The right to divorce established in Boddie is not only about ending the current marriage, but about enabling the parties to marry again in the future” (footnote omitted)).

Make no mistake: one vital reason for securing State court recognition of gay marriage is to secure its dissolution. These divorce-seeking same-sex couples are not asking for the State to extend benefits or uphold their union for marriage purposes. On the contrary, same-sex married couples vying for divorce merely need the state, the only entity capable of dissolving the union,¹¹⁴ to recognize that in some other place a marriage legally took place, that the receiving state—one where domicile and personal jurisdiction exist—has the power to dissolve. No valid reason, especially under comity, exists to deny the existence of a same-sex marriage for divorce purposes.¹¹⁵ In fact, it would seem the public policy arguments levied against same-sex unions provide the exact support for encouraging and sanctioning its dissolution. Yet, recalcitrant state courts continue to withhold their blessing of divorce, thinking that the matter is one of statutory, rather than constitutional, dimension.¹¹⁶ This author believes state courts can no longer do so without violating the fundamental right to divorce.

generations can see that laws once thought necessary and proper in fact serve only to oppress. As the Constitution endures, persons in every generation can invoke its principles in their own search for greater freedom.¹¹⁷

If the “sanctity of marriage”—a phrase often invoked to exclude those whom God and nature purportedly deem unfit for marriage—is the real basis for excluding unrelated consenting adults from entering monogamous marriages, what are we to make of society’s firmly established right to divorce and the attendant right to remarry?¹¹⁸ Why is it that we do not hear calls for a constitutional amendment banning divorce, in furthering the sanctity of marriage?¹¹⁹

One possible answer is that ours is a government based on legislative and constitutional pronouncements, not Biblical proclamations,¹²⁰ thus allowing millions of Americans, even pious ones, to celebrate their fundamental right to marry, divorce and, for many, remarry.¹²¹ In the United States there is no limit to the number of marital partners an individual can have, provided that the marriages are isolated and occur one at a time.¹²²

This court can take judicial notice of the fact that the ratio of marriages to divorces has reached a disturbing rate in many states; and that a new concept of divorce—in which there is no ‘guilty’ party—is being advocated by many groups and has been adopted by the State of California With divorce such a commonplace fact of life, it is fair to assume that many prospective marriage partners whose property and familial situation is such as to generate a valid antenuptial agreement settling their property rights upon the death of either, might want to consider and discuss . . . the disposition of their property . . . in the event their marriage, despite their best efforts, should fail.”).

119. Committee Members during the DOMA presentation simply shrugged off divorce by noting that “the fact that marriage is embattled is surely no argument for opening a new front in the [divorce] war.” See H.R. REP. NO. 104-664, at 15 (1996).

122. In contrast to the modern antipathy toward same-sex marriages, proscriptions against polygamy and bigamy have a much more solid and lengthy history. State laws banning polygamy and bigamy as void marriages predate same-sex proscriptions by hundreds of years. Compare Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333, 341 (1890) (“And on this point there can be no serious discussion or difference of

The fundamental right to divorce thus secures both the right to exit a marriage and, equally important, the right to re-enter another.¹²³

In contrast to the recent origin of the fundamental right to marry, a pedigree spanning less than fifty years, the Supreme Court has been discussing divorce for over a hundred and fifty years.¹²⁴ In 1888, the Court explained:

[W]hile marriage is often termed by text writers and in decisions of courts a civil contract, generally to indicate that it must be founded upon the agreement of the parties, and does not require any religious ceremony for its solemnization, it is something more than a mere contract. The consent of the parties is of course essential to its existence, but when the contract to marry is executed by the marriage, a relation between the parties is created which they cannot change. Other contracts may be modified, restricted, or enlarged, or entirely released upon the consent of the parties. Not so with marriage. The relation once formed, the law steps in and holds the parties to various obligations and liabilities.¹²⁵

This quotation underscores the critical nature of state action in allowing the parties to be released from the marital contract. The nineteenth century Supreme Court clearly appreciated that parties to a marriage could not simply modify their relationship without state sanc-

Texas*, 539 U.S. 558, 570 (2003) (“It was not until the 1970’s that any State singled out same-sex relations for criminal prosecution, and only nine States have done so.”). While many modern opponents of same-sex unions speak to the foundational nature of marriage as between one man and one woman, the truth of this statement is more numeric (one and one) than it is gendered. Legal prohibitions against same-sex marriage are recent inventions, not traditional legal proclamations like those against polygamy and bigamy whose history are as strong as incest. See Davis, 133 U.S. at 341; Lawrence, 539 U.S. at 570. Thus, politicians and jurists who suggest that same-sex proscriptions are identical to those of polygamy, bigamy, and incest are simply historically incorrect.

Loughran*, 292 U.S. 216 (1934) (upholding woman’s subsequent marriage as valid after receiving divorce based on her adultery—divorce which, at time, required her to refrain from remarriage). Criminal adultery laws were not the only penalty for, and protection against, adulterous conduct. The statute involved in Loughran was the District of Columbia’s ban on remarrying because, while divorce based on adultery was permitted, “in such case the innocent party only may remarry.” Id. at 221–22.

tion.¹²⁶ From the beginning of our country's history, the State has held a monopoly on an individual's right to divorce.¹²⁷

Despite the commonness of divorce in Supreme Court opinions, usually discussing the issue of divorce on the margins, the Court has never squarely held that divorce is a fundamental right.¹²⁸ The relatively few marriage cases seem to focus on marital proscriptions such as polygamy and miscegenation.¹²⁹ Divorce related issues, including inheritance and property disputes, on the other hand, have been commonly recognized and resolved by the Supreme Court since the late 1800s—often in the Full Faith and Credit context.¹³⁰ Indeed, the divorce vernacular has been more prevalent in the Supreme Court's history than cases addressing marriage. From a constitutional perspective, divorce—more so than marriage—seems historically demonstrated to have been “implicit in the concept of ordered liberty”¹³¹ such “that neither liberty nor justice would exist”¹³² if divorce were withheld from all. And, while it is universally deemed true that marriage is exclusively within the states' province, the Court has been deciding rights tangentially relating to marital dissolution for much of its history.

126. See id. at 211. In citing a Maine case, the Court continued to focus on the integral role of the state in marital dissolution:

When the contracting parties have entered into the married state, they have not so much entered into a contract as into a new relation, the rights, duties, and obligations of which rest not upon their agreement, but upon the general law of the state Their rights . . . are determined by the will of the sovereign, as evidenced by law. They can neither be modified nor changed by any agreement of parties. It is a relation for life, and the parties cannot terminate it at any shorter period by virtue of any contract they make.

In the seminal personal jurisdiction case, Pennoyer v. Neff,¹³³ the Court reminded that the state “has absolute right to prescribe the conditions upon which the marriage relation between its own citizens shall be created, and the causes for which it may be dissolved.”¹³⁴ Thus, Pennoyer recognized that the right of marriage implicitly includes its correlative opposite, the right to divorce.¹³⁵ A mere ten years later, the Supreme Court again addressed the issue of marital dissolution in Maynard v. Hill.¹³⁶ Maynard involved a wife’s equitable challenge to a Washington State divorce issued in favor of the husband despite his having abandoned her and their children without support in Ohio.¹³⁷ The Court gave a seemingly timeless explanation as to why couples seek divorce:

Many causes may arise, physical, moral, and intellectual, such as the contracting by one of the parties of an incurable disease . . . or confirmed insanity, or hopeless idiocy, or a conviction of a felony, which would render the continuance of the marriage relation intolerable to the other party, and productive of no possible benefit to society.¹³⁸

And, in this particular case, the divorce was apparently brought on by the husband’s very modern desire to simply marry another.¹³⁹

Long before the Supreme Court recognized the importance of marital privacy and the sacrosanct nature of intimate decisions between consenting adults, the Court was already appreciating that the indispensable synchronous right of marriage is divorce.¹⁴⁰ The State, at least in America, has always provided both an entrance into and an exit from marriage. The Puritans recognized that divorce fostered community harmony because “[m]arriages had to be sound if the community was to be sound.”¹⁴¹ The Puritans understood that “irremediable cases should be eliminated by divorce.”¹⁴² While few Americans celebrate the idea of divorce, we certainly appreciate the safety valve divorce provides. It is like seeing a lifeboat on a cruise ship. Your hope is you never need it, but it is

So, how does one successfully assert that divorce qualifies as a fundamental right under the Court's substantive due process cases protecting liberty and privacy interests with fundamental right status? This author believes that while the journey is not entirely linear, disjointed journeys are often what have quilted together the Court's fluid demarcation of all fundamental rights.

While most scholars correctly assert that the personal right to privacy, under substantive due process, originated with Griswold v. Connecticut,¹⁴⁴ the language supporting Griswold and its progeny goes back much further.¹⁴⁵ The fundamental right to "liberty" and, ultimately, "privacy," owe their heritage to a string of decisions evaluating whether to fully incorporate, under the Fourteenth Amendment, the Bill of Rights protections against the States.¹⁴⁶ These cases generally assessed criminal procedure issues, such as double jeopardy and the right to be free from coerced confessions.¹⁴⁷ The quintessential language in determining whether a right qualifies as a fundamental right under the Constitution stems from cases as far back as the Court's 1937 decision in Palko v. Connecticut.¹⁴⁸

143. See id. at 12 (discussing first known American divorce between James Luxford and his unnamed wife). While "divorce" properly did not exist in every colony or every state, some form of marital dissolution was available in every colony and every state since our country's founding. Id. at 1-61.

144. 381 U.S. 479 (1965).

145. See, e.g., Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 536-41 (1942) (describing procreation rights of person convicted for stealing chickens and of two separate robberies as "human rights"). Skinner, an Equal Protection case, found that Oklahoma's law permitting sterilization of persons convicted as "habitual criminals" violated "one of the basic civil rights of man." Id. at 541. Skinner found that "[m]arriage and procreation are fundamental to the very existence and survival of the race." Id. Thus, in one short sentence, the Court began the process of elevating the marital and procreative rights of Americans to fundamental status—albeit, under the Equal Protection rubric at first.

146. See Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319, 324-26 (1937) (referencing Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 78 (1908); Hebert v. Louisiana, 272 U.S. 312 (1926); Snyder v. Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97 (1934); and Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936) all as helping to create the test for rights deemed "the very essence of a scheme of ordered liberty"). Palko, 302 U.S. at 323-26. While these cases most certainly cannot be credited with creating the modern "privacy" doctrine, as such, their heritage is clear as the language of these cases has been cited in numerous modern substantive due process cases ranging from Griswold to Roe.

147. For a further discussion of these cases, see supra note 146.

148. 302 U.S. 319 (1937), overruled by Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784 (1969). Palko held that the right to be free from double jeopardy was not a right of fundamental character. Id. at 328. The Court asked, "[d]oes [the right to be free from double jeopardy] violate those 'fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions?'" Id. (quoting Hebert, 272 U.S. at 316). Finding the answer to "surely" be no, the Palko Court refused to incorporate the Fifth Amendment's proscription against double jeopardy to apply to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment. Id. See also Planned Parenthood of Se. Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 846 (1992) (noting Justice

Palko instructs that there are certain inalienable rights that are so vital as to be “the very essence of a scheme of ordered liberty.”¹⁴⁹ To abolish these rights, would “violate a ‘principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental.’”¹⁵⁰ The Palko inquiry—“[d]oes [denying a particular right] violate those ‘fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions’?”—has amazingly withstood the test of time, though many of the decisions employing the Palko or Griswold tests early on, including Palko itself, have not.¹⁵¹ Because the Supreme Court has not directly addressed whether divorce qualifies as a fundamental right, arguments in favor or against its application must carefully consider the right to divorce under the Palko/Griswold paradigm.¹⁵²

Griswold remains a staple in every introductory Constitutional Law course.¹⁵³ Griswold established a fundamental right to privacy, “emanat[ing]” from the penumbral rights of the Fourteenth Amendment.¹⁵⁴ The Court, in distinguishing its decision regarding issues relating to marital privacy from those touching mere economic problems, found:

The association of people is not mentioned in the Constitution nor in the Bill of Rights. The right to educate a child in a school of the parent’s choice—whether public or private or parochial—is also not mentioned. Nor is the right to study any particular subject or any foreign language. Yet the First Amendment has been construed to include certain of those rights. . . . The right of freedom of speech and press includes not only the right to utter or to print, but the right to distribute, the right to receive, the right to read and freedom of inquiry, freedom of thought, 152. But see Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702, 720–22 (1997) (suggesting modern approach to “rein in” substantive due process). Despite Glucksberg’s seemingly restrictive language, the Court nonetheless references Snyder v. Massachusetts and Palko v. Connecticut to outline the proper methodology for discerning whether a particular right qualifies for “fundamental right” status under the Constitution. Id. at 720–21. This author believes that while Glucksberg appears to constrict the Court’s power to articulate “fundamental rights,” divorce, due to its firm grounding in our country’s history and tradition, meets the exacting test still analyzed under Palko and its progeny.

and freedom to teach—indeed the freedom of the entire university community. Without those peripheral rights the specific rights would be less secure.¹⁵⁵

Griswold recognized, after canvassing the history of First Amendment cases, that when combining the penumbral rights of the First, Third, Fourth, and Fifth Amendments, one arrives at a legitimate “right of privacy.”¹⁵⁶ While this First, Third, Fourth, and Fifth combination may be scrutinized, and the concept of what truly emanates from the penumbras remains subject to fair criticism, there can be no denying that marital privacy is “a right of privacy older than the Bill of Rights—older than our political parties, older than our school system. . . . [I]t is an association for as noble a purpose as any involved in [the Court’s] prior decisions.”¹⁵⁷

Interestingly, the Griswold majority refrained from any reference to earlier cases that utilized the traditional fundamental-rights-making language. The concurring opinions, however, buttressed their decisions by focusing on whether the traditions and collective conscience of our people indicated a principle that was so deeply rooted therein as to be ranked fundamental.¹⁵⁸ Focusing on marital liberties, Justice Goldberg reminded that liberty gains content from both the emanations of specific constitutional guarantees and “from experience with the requirements of a free society.”¹⁵⁹ “The inquiry is whether a right involved ‘is of such a character that it cannot be denied without violating those fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions’”¹⁶⁰ Under this analysis, it is hard to deny that considering the experience and requirements of a free society, divorce—much like procreative freedoms—qualifies as a fundamental right. Divorce is, in fact, of such an important character that its access cannot be denied without violating the fundamental principles of liberty and justice which we all depend upon in making life’s most intimate decisions.¹⁶¹

Roe v. Wade,¹⁶² which established a woman’s qualified right to access abortion, fortifies the notion that divorce qualifies as a fundamental constitutional right.¹⁶³ While the Constitution fails to explicitly mention “any right of privacy,” the Court, “[i]n a line of decisions . . . going back perhaps as far as” 1891 has recognized and supported such a right.¹⁶⁴ These decisions “make it clear that only personal rights that can be deemed ‘fundamental’ or ‘implicit in the concept of ordered liberty,’ are included in this guarantee of personal privacy.”¹⁶⁵ “They also make it clear that the right has some extension to activities relating to marriage.”¹⁶⁶ This author believes that divorce, much like procreation, contraception and child-rearing decisions, is a right uniquely related to, but distinguishable from, marriage.

Divorce, much like the decision whether to abort a pregnancy, involves a choice that has far-reaching physical and mental health considerations.¹⁶⁷ Such choice, if withheld by the State may “force upon the [individual] a distressful life and future.”¹⁶⁸ “Psychological harm may be imminent.”¹⁶⁹ “Mental and physical health may be taxed” by being forced to carry a child to term or, similarly, by being forced to remain in an unhappy marriage.¹⁷⁰

The Supreme Court has consistently focused on the fundamental nature of intimate decisions, particularly those affecting family relations.¹⁷¹ In reaffirming the essential holding of *Roe, Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey*¹⁷² renewed the “promise of the Constitution that there is a realm of personal liberty which the government may not enter.”¹⁷³ Marriage and rights corresponding to marriage were specifically referenced as underscoring this point.¹⁷⁴ Casey specifically notes that “[o]ur law affords constitutional protection to personal decisions relating to marriage, procreation, contraception, family relationships, child rearing, and education.”¹⁷⁵ In summarizing the Court’s approach regarding fundamental rights, Justice O’Connor notes:

These matters, involving the most intimate and personal choices a person may make in a lifetime, choices central to personal dignity and autonomy, are central to the liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. At the heart of liberty is the right to define one’s own concept of existence, of meaning, of the universe, and of the mystery of human life. Beliefs about these matters could not define the attributes of personhood were they formed under compulsion of the State.¹⁷⁶

The State, and the State alone, has the power to dissolve marital unions.¹⁷⁷ Unlike other contracts and family arrangements, the imprimatur of the State upon a wedding license seals the exits for married couples until, and unless, the State opens the emergency door leading to divorce. Using the framework set out above, courts are left to ascertain through “reasoned judgment” whether the right to divorce qualifies for fundamental protection.¹⁷⁸ This author, considering the most recent Supreme Court decisions at the intersection of life, love, and divorce, believes that case law supports a positive answer to the query.

V. LIFE, LOVE, AND DIVORCE—THE ESSENTIAL AND FUNDAMENTAL NATURE OF DIVORCE

People aren’t coming out to celebrate the right to divorce. . . . But it may turn out that the right to divorce is as important to celebrate as the right to marry.¹⁷⁹

The Supreme Court, starting in earnest with Griswold, has demarcated a particular line in the constitutional sand—marriage and the corresponding bundle of martial rights are fundamentally protected under the Fourteenth Amendment.¹⁸⁰ Cases that may be only tangentially related to marriage, such as the right to choose how to educate your children, fall squarely within the bundle.¹⁸¹ Likewise, the decision to engage in sexual intimacy for the sheer sake of enjoyment has been included.¹⁸² And, so too, has the decision whether to live with nuclear family members.¹⁸³ Di-

The inescapable fact is that adjudication of substantive due process claims may call upon the Court in interpreting the Constitution to exercise that same capacity which by tradition courts have always exercised: reasoned judgment. Its boundaries are not susceptible of expression as a simple rule. That does not mean we are free to invalidate state policy choices with which we disagree; yet neither does it permit us to shrink from the duties of our office.

voice seems to be similar to these rights from both a qualitative, and constitutional, perspective.

A. Love

In a very real sense, the Supreme Court has given broader protection to our ability to love whom we choose within the last fifteen years.¹⁸⁴ Beginning with Romer v. Evans in 1996, the Court held that a Colorado constitutional amendment singling out gay and lesbian individuals for differential treatment, including potential access to housing, employment and state courts, was irrational and constitutionally unacceptable.¹⁸⁵ Using Equal Protection, Romer struck down the amendment because it singled out a particular class of persons, homosexuals, and “impose[d] a special disability upon those persons alone.”¹⁸⁶ Colorado was unable to provide sufficient justification for its classification, prompting Justice Kennedy to remark “that the amendment seems inexplicable by anything but animus toward the class it affects.”¹⁸⁷ Colorado sought to justify its exclusionary amendment on the grounds that it respects “other citizens’ freedom of association, and in particular the liberties of landlords or employers who have personal or religious objections to homosexuality.”¹⁸⁸ This reasoning harkens back to the anti-miscegenation period where hotel operators and restaurants could exclude persons based on their race alone.¹⁸⁹ Just as many state laws during anti-miscegenation times found support in White Supremacy and contempt for racial minorities, the Colorado statute seemed to be based on similar notions of hegemony and disdain.¹⁹⁰

Romer, even limited as it was to preventing states from singling out discrete minority groups for maltreatment and ostracism, fortifies the argument that divorce is a fundamental right that cannot be denied based solely on a person’s minority classification. Surely if states were to outlaw

184. Two areas where the Court has not varied its limitation on even consensual intimate conduct are incestuous relationships and polygamous relationships.

190. See Romer, 517 U.S. at 635 (“We must conclude that Amendment 2 classifies homosexuals not to further a proper legislative end but to make them unequal to everyone else. This Colorado cannot do. A State cannot so deem a class of persons a stranger to its laws.”).

divorce solely for the mentally or physically handicapped, there would be outrage. And, case authority suggests that such a law would be struck down as failing even the minimal rational basis test.¹⁹¹ But, this author believes that the right to divorce is stronger than merely an Equal Protection claim. Instead, the right, like the right relating to all marital-issues, should find shelter under the substantive due process cases granting the protection of strict scrutiny review to fundamental rights.

Following the Supreme Court's decision in Lawrence, no longer can same-sex couples be prosecuted for their consensual intimate acts.¹⁹² Lawrence was to sodomy laws what *McLaughlin v. Florida*¹⁹³ was to anti-miscegenation laws.¹⁹⁴ Sexual intimacy is first protected. Then, those relationships where sexual intimacy naturally occurs receive protection. In this manner, interracial couples first received protection for sexual intimacy in McLaughlin. Shortly thereafter, in Loving, interracial couples received the constitutional right to marry.¹⁹⁵

The tide has clearly turned and the modern trend that Justice Kennedy relies upon in Lawrence suggests that acts of sexual intimacy are increasingly becoming part of the intimate associational rights protected under the Constitution. While a strong argument can be made that the right to divorce stems from our constitutionally-protected rights to sexual autonomy or our associational rights, this Article is more narrowly focused. Divorce is, or should be, a free-standing fundamental right, much like the opposing right to marry.

It is unclear whether Lawrence elevates same-sex intimate conduct to fundamental right status.¹⁹⁶ In fact, it is hard to appreciate how the law is 194. Lawrence, 539 U.S. at 564. To be clear, Lawrence considered the right to sexual intimacy under substantive Due Process grounds while McLaughlin was an Equal Protection case. Despite this salient difference, the two cases both eradicate criminal prosecutions for consensual acts of sexual intimacy where the lone "illegal" criteria was either race or sexual orientation.

195. Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12 (1967). While some scholars suggest that marriage and domestic relations have always been the province of state courts and legislatures, Loving assuredly proves this is not the case. Loving demonstrates the federal government's plenary power over marriage—particularly when states attempt to withhold marital rights from couples deemed unfit for marriage by the majority.

196. Lawrence, 539 U.S. at 578 (deciding in case which involves "two adults who, with full and mutual consent from each other, engaged in a sexual practices common to a homosexual lifestyle. . . . Their right to liberty under the Due Pro-

Justice Scalia presciently suggests that Lawrence opens the door to legalizing gay marriage.²⁰¹ Justice Scalia is undoubtedly viewing the evolutionary trajectory of Romer and *Lawrence*²⁰² through the prism of *McLaughlin*²⁰³ and Loving.²⁰⁴ The first step to achieving a constitutional right to interracial marriage was to eradicate the underlying criminal concess Clause gives them the full right to engage in their conduct without intervention of the government.”).

197. While Justice Kennedy and the majority rely on substantive due process, Justice O’Connor’s concurring opinion would find an Equal Protection violation, similar to McLaughlin. Id. at 579–80 (O’Connor, J., concurring). But, despite analyzing the case under the right to liberty, and seemingly finding such right to exist, Justice Kennedy and the majority never apply the exacting strict scrutiny analysis familiarly associated with fundamental rights. Justice Scalia in his Lawrence dissent correctly notes the ambiguity of the majority’s opinion. Id. at 594 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (noting that “[n]ot once does [the majority] describe homosexual sodomy as a ‘fundamental right’ or a ‘fundamental liberty interest,’ nor does it subject the Texas statute to strict scrutiny”).

198. See Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620, 636 (1996) (Scalia, J., dissenting) (noting that, rather than respectfully dissenting as so many Justices have historically done, Justice Scalia stated: “I vigorously dissent”).

199. Lawrence, 539 U.S. at 590 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (“State laws against bigamy, same-sex marriage, adult incest, prostitution, masturbation, adultery, fornication, bestiality, and obscenity are . . . called into question by today’s decision”).

200. Justice Scalia’s Lawrence dissent is rich in irony. In Romer he criticized Justice Kennedy’s majority opinion for being “so long on emotive utterance and so short on relevant legal citation.” Romer, 517 U.S. at 639 (Scalia, J., dissenting). Yet, in Lawrence, Justice Scalia speaks of the vulnerability of fornication, masturbation, and bestiality laws without offering a single statute or case application where masturbation (performed in private) has been criminally condemned and prosecuted. Lawrence, 539 U.S. at 590 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

201. Lawrence, 539 U.S. at 601–02 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (arguing Court’s “reasoning leaves on pretty shaky grounds state laws limiting marriage to opposite-sex couples”). In supporting his argument that same-sex marriage laws are now vulnerable, Justice Scalia notes that societal feelings that certain conduct is immoral and unacceptable “is the same justification that supports many other laws regulating sexual behavior that make a distinction based upon the identity of the partner—for examples, laws against adultery, fornication, and adult incest, and laws refusing to recognize homosexual marriage.” Id. at 600.

202. See id. at 604 (“Today’s opinion dismantles the structure of constitutional law that has permitted a distinction to be made between heterosexual and homosexual unions, insofar as formal recognition in marriage is concerned.”).

203. McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 185 n.1 (1964) (striking down state statute criminalizing the “occupying same room” at nighttime or living together of interracial couples).

duct often relied upon by states to support its proscription.²⁰⁵ The syllogism was simple: interracial sex is criminal, sex is part of marriage; hence, interracial marriage must also be criminal. With that syllogism fatally wounded in McLaughlin and eventually struck down entirely in Loving, the predicate has indeed been drawn for same-sex marriage. Scalia fears, perhaps not altogether unjustified, that the proverbial slippery slope toward gay marriage has been fully lodged open by Lawrence.²⁰⁶

For purposes of this Article, however, the importance of both Romer and Lawrence is the fact that these decisions grant same-sex individuals some measure of protection before the law.²⁰⁷ In Romer, the protection is grounded in Equal Protection.²⁰⁸ In Lawrence, the protection is more enigmatic, though excepting the failure to apply strict scrutiny analysis, Justice Kennedy gives strong indication that consensual sodomy is now a protected "liberty" interest under substantive due process.²⁰⁹ Homosexuals, contrary to the querulous urgings of Justice Scalia, are not the same as bigamists or polygamists. For literally centuries the Supreme Court has drawn a clear distinction between those desiring to marry multiple partners and those desiring consensual intimate privacy.²¹⁰

205. Lawrence, 539 U.S. at 604 (Scalia, J., dissenting). In a very telling paragraph, Justice Scalia compares the Court's direction with our northern neighbors, Canada.

One of the benefits of leaving regulation of this matter to the people rather than to the courts is that the people, unlike judges, need not carry things to their logical conclusion. The people may feel that their disapprobation of homosexual conduct is strong enough to disallow homosexual marriage, but not strong enough to criminalize private homosexual acts—and may legislate accordingly. The Court today pretends that it possesses a similar freedom of action, so that we need not fear judicial imposition of homosexual marriage, as has recently occurred in Canada

206. See id. at 599 (asserting that Lawrence "effectively decrees the end of all morals legislation" (emphasis added)). Justice Scalia further faults the majority for signing "on to the so-called homosexual agenda . . ." Id. at 602.

207. Despite Justice Scalia's virulent dissents containing inflammatory language in both cases, these cases do indeed exempt same-sex individuals from their previous "affiliation" or grouping with incestuous and polygamous relationships.

208. Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620, 633 (1996) ("Central both to the idea of the rule of law and to our own Constitution's guarantee of equal protection is the principle that government and each of its parts remain open on impartial terms to all who seek its assistance.").

210. See Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333, 341-42 (1890) (stating "[b]igamy and polygamy are crimes by the laws of all civilized and Christian countries. They are crimes by the laws of the United States, and they are crimes by the laws of Idaho. . . . To call their advocacy a tenet of religion is to offend the common sense of mankind").

Despite the rhetoric²¹¹ and false analogies,²¹² including those proffered by Justice Scalia,²¹³ homosexuals are no longer in the same legal position as incestuous and polygamous couples. Nothing that occurred in either Romer or Lawrence overturned the Supreme Court's decisions in *Reynolds v. United States*²¹⁴ or *Davis v. Beason*²¹⁵ finding state laws banning bigamy and polygamy constitutional. Putting to the side the hyperbolic analogies drawn by Justice Scalia, the rights of gays and lesbians to partake in most fundamental rights relating to associational intimacy are now constitutionally stronger. Strong enough, one wonders, to include divorce?

B. Life

To qualify a "right" as fundamental, various elements must be satisfied. In 1997, when the Supreme Court addressed whether assisted suicide was constitutionally protected, many scholars believed the Court had finally retreated from its liberal treatment of fundamental rights that began with Griswold.²¹⁶ Because the Court's decision in *Washington v. Glucksberg*²¹⁷ suggests a shift in direction, consideration of this case becomes imperative in discussing any potential fundamental right.²¹⁸ While assisted suicide might not, at first glance, have much to do with divorce, the common thread is whether certain intimate behavior qualifies for fundamental right status.

211. See Lawrence, 539 U.S. at 597 (Scalia, J., dissenting) ("I do not know what 'acting in private' means; surely consensual sodomy, like heterosexual intercourse, is rarely performed on stage.").

212. See id. at 599 (arguing that "the same interest furthered by criminal laws against fornication, bigamy, adultery, adult incest, bestiality, and obscenity" underlie decisions to criminalize intimate conduct of private, consenting adults). These comparisons are poorly supported, completely lacking citation or case authority, and are, respectfully, equally lacking in logic. States prohibit bestiality to protect animals, as animals can never consent to such conduct. States prohibit adultery to preserve the sanctity of marriage, a viable state interest completely removed from same-sex intimate conduct. Likewise, states prohibit bigamy to protect the sanctity of marriage and secure inheritance and other marriage-related rights. These categories, which are convenient to group together, do not share the similarities that Justice Scalia, without citing any authority, represents. See id. And, ironically, Justice Scalia engages in precisely the same approach he condemned in Romer, drafting an opinion with "heavy reliance upon principles of righteousness rather than judicial holdings." Romer, 517 U.S. at 636 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

In contrast to sexual intimacy issues, the Supreme Court has held that individuals do not have a liberty interest in assisted suicide.²¹⁹ In Glucksberg, the Court began by evaluating whether the right to assisted suicide “has any place in our Nation’s traditions.”²²⁰ Even at this starting point, courts can easily distinguish the right to assisted suicide from divorce. Contrary to divorce, countries have long proscribed and condemned suicide.²²¹ “Despite changes in medical technology and notwithstanding an increased emphasis on the importance of end-of-life decisionmaking, [society has] not retreated from this prohibition.”²²² It was against this historical backdrop, considering tradition and practice, that the Supreme Court refused to extend any liberty interest to assisted suicide.²²³ Unlike divorce, the Glucksberg Court was:

[C]onfronted with a consistent and almost universal tradition that has long rejected the asserted right, and continues explicitly to reject it today, even for terminally ill, mentally competent adults. To hold for respondents, we would have to reverse centuries of legal doctrine and practice, and strike down the considered policy choice of almost every State.²²⁴

Divorce, in numerous variations, is available in all fifty states.²²⁵ In fact, historically only one state, South Carolina, has ever proscribed divorce and, even then, the ban was temporary.²²⁶ Divorce has been widely available to most Americans since the 1960s, when Ronald Reagan, then California Governor, signed the Nation’s first no-fault divorce bill into law.²²⁷ Since that time, divorce has been readily and easily available.²²⁸ Prior to that time, divorce may have required proof of cause, but that proof was generally easy to provide and equally easy to achieve.²²⁹ Divorce has the near opposite pedigree of assisted suicide. While assisted suicide has been universally condemned, divorce has been regularly offered and voraciously utilized.²³⁰ While assisted suicide has been outlawed, divorce has been a legal part of American existence since the country's founding.²³¹ In this regard, divorce stands on much firmer constitutional footing than assisted suicide.²³²

Many scholars agree that Glucksberg constricted the Court's ability to establish "fundamental rights" under substantive due process.²³³ Yet, the Court's language is tempered by its actual decision-making process in both Glucksberg and, subsequently, in Lawrence. Both opinions focus almost singularly on the historical practices of our country.²³⁴ Thus, courts analyzing the character of an asserted fundamental right to divorce must begin, like Glucksberg, by considering "whether this asserted right has any place in

C. Divorce

Couples marry. Couples divorce. As tragic as it sounds, this is the American love story.²³⁷ Or, at least this is the American love story for millions and millions of Americans dating back to our country's earliest days.²³⁸

The Supreme Court has, however, never directly held that divorce is a fundamental right.²³⁹ Most of the Supreme Court's decisions relating to divorce continue to both recognize and uphold the right of divorce with an almost conspiratorial appreciation that the right exists—as a “right.” The Court has regularly rendered decisions impacting, upholding, and otherwise protecting divorce as a viable institution.²⁴⁰ The Court's two most recent decisions implicating divorce are *Boddie v. Connecticut*²⁴¹ and Sosna v. Iowa.²⁴²

Boddie can be considered either an access to the courts case or a case protecting indigents, much like Zablocki in the marital realm. In 1971, the Court concluded that divorce is far too important to relegate, wholly, to individual state control.²⁴³ Writing for the majority, Justice Harlan explained the Court's reasoning in striking down a Connecticut filing fee in divorce cases:

REV. 935, 978–83 (1981) (focusing, as this author does, on states' monopolization of divorce process in suggesting that divorce is fundamental right). “A state's categorical refusal to grant divorces would, of course, be tantamount to both a denial of procedural access and a substantive legal right.” Id. at 983. Professor Strickman argues that a state's “categorical refusal to do so is a restriction on liberty of a magnitude which demands strict scrutiny.” Id.

240. See generally Estin, supra note 227. Connecticut*, 401 U.S. 371, 376, 386 (1971)).

242. 419 U.S. 393 (1975).

243. See Boddie, 401 U.S. at 374.

Our conclusion is that, given the basic position of the marriage relationship in this society's hierarchy of values and the concomitant state monopolization of the means for legally dissolving this relationship, due process does prohibit a State from denying, solely because of inability to pay, access to its courts to individuals who seek judicial dissolution of their marriages.²⁴⁴

Despite the language focusing on an individual's ability to pay, the bulk of the opinion focuses on the due process right of all individuals to access the courts.²⁴⁵ Such access becomes increasingly important in the situation of divorce because state courts provide "the only avenue to dissolution" of marriage.²⁴⁶ This monopoly of power evokes due process concerns—certainly procedural, but also, this author believes, substantive in nature.²⁴⁷

The Boddie Court admitted unawareness "of any jurisdiction where private citizens may covenant for or dissolve marriages without state approval."²⁴⁸

Even where all substantive requirements are concededly met, we know of no instance where two consenting adults may divorce and mutually liberate themselves from the constraints of legal obligations that go with marriage, and more fundamentally the prohibition against remarriage, without invoking the State's judicial machinery.²⁴⁹

Thus, divorce is qualitatively unique and mandates some added measure of due process protection for all individuals seeking access to divorce.²⁵⁰ Boddie goes only as far as necessary to decide the issue directly before the Court, but the reasoning and language suggest that any individual seeking divorce must, at a minimum, "be given a meaningful opportunity to be heard."²⁵¹ Precluding access to the only doors available to dissolve a legal marriage undoubtedly implicates due process concerns.²⁵² Boddie intimates, without holding, that states cannot foreclose an entire group, based either on economics or orientation, from accessing divorce.²⁵³

The opinion's final paragraph provides the strongest rationale for finding that divorce is a fundamental right protected not only by procedural due process but, also, by substantive due process:

The requirement that these appellants resort to the judicial process is entirely a state-created matter. Thus we hold only that a State may not, consistent with the obligations imposed on it by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, pre-empt the right to dissolve this legal relationship without affording all citizens access to the means it has prescribed for doing so.²⁵⁴

The Court's use of the phrase "all citizens" is telling. A generous reading of Boddie requires acknowledgement that the States' monopoly on divorce impacts federal concerns. In resolving divorce requests, states do not operate entirely outside constitutional restraint. Some federal limits, it appears, are acceptable in the realm of divorce.

Sosna is not inapposite. Sosna upheld a one-year durational residency requirement prior to petitioning for divorce. Iowa's one-year residency requirement is easily distinguishable from other right to travel cases because the state's interest in divorce requires that individuals be "genuinely attached to the State."²⁵⁵ This attachment helps "insulate divorce decrees from the likelihood of collateral attack."²⁵⁶ A durational waiting period, however, is vastly distinct from the exclusion—for all time—from the state's divorce courts.²⁵⁷

Justice Rehnquist, writing for the Court, clarified the constitutional distinction between Sosna and Boddie.

[T]he gravamen of appellant Sosna's claim is not total deprivation, as in Boddie, but only delay. The operation of the filing fee in Boddie served to exclude forever a certain segment of the population from obtaining a divorce in the courts of Connecticut. No similar total deprivation is present in appellant's case, and the delay which attends the enforcement of the one-year durational residency requirement is . . . [therefore] consistent with the provisions of the United States Constitution.²⁵⁸

253. Id. at 380–81 (“[T]he State’s refusal to admit these appellants to its courts, the sole means in Connecticut for obtaining a divorce, must be regarded as the equivalent of denying them an opportunity to be heard upon their claimed right to a dissolution of their marriages . . .”).

258. Id.

Thus, were a state to forever exclude “a certain segment of the population” from accessing divorce, it is unlikely the Court would turn a blind eye to such deprivation.²⁵⁹ Rather, the Court’s language suggests that this right is subject to delay, but not complete denial.

When these cases are considered together, in light of the settled criteria for recognizing fundamental rights, a viable argument can be made that divorce qualifies as a liberty right under substantive due process. No more important rights attend to marriage than the rights to both enter and exit the relationship. Divorce is an unfortunate, but necessary, prerogative in our American society.²⁶⁰ People treasure their right to enter a legally binding marriage union. In fact, gays and lesbians continue to battle for marital equality at both the state and federal level. While that struggle is important for a myriad of reasons, the battle for divorce is equally important—lest homosexuals win the battle only to realize they have lost the war.

VI. YOU’VE MADE YOUR BED—THE INESCAPABILITY OF GAY MARRIAGE

The framers of the Constitution knew, and we should not forget today, that there is no more effective practical guaranty against arbitrary and unreasonable government than to require that the principles of law which officials would impose on a minority must be imposed generally. Conversely, nothing opens the door to arbitrary action so effectively as to allow those officials to pick and choose only a few to whom they will apply legislation and thus to escape the political retribution that might be visited upon them if larger numbers were affected. Courts can take no better measure to assure that laws will be just than to require that laws be equal in operation.²⁶¹

Is divorce a component of marriage, or merely a corollary? Will the Supreme Court consider divorce as part of the rights associated with marriage? The answers to these questions are critical, especially to the gay community that has a very limited, regional right to legally marry.²⁶² If divorce is a corollary to marriage, if divorce is part of the bundle of marital

259. Id. (emphasis added).

260. See generally RILEY, supra note 11, at 185 (“A life-long marriage can be held as a societal ideal, a goal, a standard to be worked toward, while divorce provisions can end disintegrating marriages incapable of achieving the ideal.”).

262. Ironically, the regional nature of this right mirrors quite closely the interracial struggle for marital equality. Southern politicians urged protection, even national protection at times, against interracial marriage. One of the more disturbing portrayals of the southern viewpoint was presented on the House Floor by Georgia Representative Seaborn Roddenbery:

No brutality, no infamy, no degradation in all the years of southern slavery possessed such villainous character and such atrocious qualities as the provision of the laws of Illinois, New York, Massachusetts, and other rights, then their marital rights are as portable as the couple is. But, if divorce is a component of marriage, state courts may continue to treat gay marriage, and its component right to divorce, as beyond their subject matter jurisdiction. For these same-sex couples, the right to marry, once exercised, becomes the most final act possible, taking on a sense of permanency and inescapability that non-gay couples never contemplate.²⁶³

Much to the consternation of the straight community, it appears that when it comes to love, marriage, and divorce the heterosexual and homosexual communities have much in common. Both appear to desire lasting, committed relationships sanctioned by the state covenant of marriage. Both appear to recognize that when marriages fail, it is the state—and the state alone—that provides the opportunity to be released from this commitment via divorce.²⁶⁴ And, both communities appear to appreciate that while love and marriage are the ideal, divorce is all too often the reality. Justice Jackson's 1949 comments serve as a harbinger to the gay rights struggle regarding divorce.²⁶⁵ If divorce is wrong for some, it must be wrong for all.²⁶⁶ And, conversely, if the right to end a marital union exists—constitutionally speaking—for some, it should exist for all.²⁶⁷

Divorce should exist for all, not merely because Justice Jackson's cries for justness demand equality. Divorce should exist for all because divorce is a fundamental right protected under the liberty and privacy doctrines of substantive due process. Divorce has existed since the founding of our nation and is undoubtedly "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty."²⁶⁸

Divorce is such that “neither liberty nor justice would exist”²⁶⁹ without its presence.²⁷⁰ Imagine, if you can, a world where people once married are forever married. Forever. Would Americans really enter into unbreakable vows?

Marriage, littered with limitations dating back to our country’s founding, is not the proper prism through which to evaluate divorce. Rather, to the extent that divorce is a corollary of marriage, it is more akin to the privacy rights of contraception and abortion—they both exist as independent rights—though their connection is indisputable.²⁷¹ Women have a right to seek to avoid pregnancy through resort to contraception.²⁷² And, when that attempt either fails or was improperly utilized, the Constitution provides a qualified fundamental right to abortion to end that pregnancy.²⁷³

Similarly, while the states have the right to qualify the fundamental right of marriage, the only qualification to divorce that appears constitutional is the limited residency requirements that states can impose.²⁷⁴ Beyond residency and domicile, there have not been any constitutionally recognized limits to divorce as a fundamental right.²⁷⁵ In fact, there are vastly more limitations placed on marriage (similar to abortion) than there have been on divorce (similar to contraception).²⁷⁶ These two rights, both fundamental constitutionally speaking, exist separate and distinct from each other. Without marriage there is no need for divorce. But, divorce provides a fundamental right that is both separate and severable from marriage. Divorce, in the eyes of the Constitution, stands independently.

Casey*, 505 U.S. 833, 852 (1992) (noting that “[i]t should be recognized, moreover, that in some critical respects the abortion decision is of the same character as the decision to use contraception . . .”). Justice O’Connor, writing in Casey, explained that the contraception and abortion decisions both relate to “the woman’s liberty because they involve decisions concerning not only the meaning of procreation but also human responsibility and respect for it.” Id. at 853.

275. This is not to suggest that states do not have the right to determine upon what grounds (such as cruelty, adultery, desertion, or no-fault) divorce may be granted. Rather, this simply notes that there have been no other constitutionally recognized limits placed upon the grounds for divorce.

276. See RILEY, supra note 11, at 163.

Divorce, it seems, is more American than the many rights enveloped in the Constitution since the 1960s.²⁷⁷ Although contraception could be and was proscribed completely prior to Griswold, divorce was not.²⁷⁸ Although abortion could be outlawed and criminally punished prior to Roe, divorce was not. And, although marriage and adultery—particularly of the interracial variety—could be prosecuted, and were prior to Loving, divorce was not.

The foundational nature of divorce as a fundamental right is unquestionable. Divorce came to our shores with the early colonists and remains an American tradition more sacred, historically, and perhaps more ardently heralded, than the freedom to marry.²⁷⁹ As one Texas court noted, “[w]e think that such a law or policy [denying divorce] . . . would constitute cruel and unusual punishment and actually place one of the spouses, in effect, in a prison from which there was no parole.”²⁸⁰ Divorce ensures that individuals can dissolve unions that are damaging, stale, unfaithful, or, modernly at least, in any matter unsatisfying. No-fault divorce has a pedigree as solid and enduring as the constitutional right to access contraceptives, sexual intimacy, abortions, and interracial marriages.²⁸¹ President Ronald Reagan famously noted that the only vote he regretted was his decision to approve “no-fault” divorce.²⁸² But approve it he did.²⁸³

And many states followed his lead.²⁸⁴ Even today, Reagan remains our only divorced, and remarried, President.²⁸⁵

American society could not continue without the fundamental right to marry, divorce, and remarry. Divorce, for better or worse, is as much a part of marriage as rings, bridesmaids, and wedding cakes. Just ask your straight neighbor or co-worker. Chances are they have exercised their long cherished right to say, "I do. I did. But, I don't anymore."
