It’s in the “Telling” (by Asking): A Passover Analogy to Explain the Enduring Foundational Nature of Carrie Menkel-Meadow’s Dispute Resolution Scholarship

James R. Coben
Mitchell Hamline School of Law, james.coben@mitchellhamline.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarship.law.tamu.edu/lawreview

Part of the Dispute Resolution and Arbitration Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.37419/LR.V10.I1.2

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by Texas A&M Law Scholarship. It has been accepted for inclusion in Texas A&M Law Review by an authorized editor of Texas A&M Law Scholarship. For more information, please contact aretteen@law.tamu.edu.
IT’S IN THE “TELLING” (BY ASKING):
A PASSOVER ANALOGY TO EXPLAIN THE ENDURING FOUNDATIONAL NATURE OF CARRIE MENKEL-MEADOW’S
DISPUTE RESOLUTION SCHOLARSHIP

by: James R. Coben*

TABLE OF CONTENTS

I. INTRODUCTION: ONE (SUCCESSFUL) MODEL FOR STORYTELLING ACROSS GENERATIONS ............................... 25
   A. One True Measure of Whether Ideas Are “Foundational”........ 25
   B. Judaism, One of the World’s Oldest Religions, Offers an Annual Ritual— the Passover Seder—that Exemplifies Success in Passing Down Foundational Ideas. That Ritual, Among Other Things, Posits That to Tell an Enduring Story, It Must Be Told in Ways That Inspire Many Different Kinds of People—with Widely Disparate Motivations, Perspectives, and Abilities—to Engage with, Relate To, and Understand the Story. This Essay Asserts that Carrie Menkel-Meadow’s Dispute Resolution Scholarship Is Very Much a Successful “Telling” with Many Characteristics Remarkably Similar to the Passover Seder. And That in Turn Explains Why Menkel-Meadow’s Work Has Been So Important to the First Generation of Dispute Resolution Scholars and Practitioners, and Why It Will Endure as Foundational for Generations to Come. I Admit to Taking a Risk Here. At First Glance, It Might Seem Odd to Assert That a Many-Centuries-Old Religious Tradition—the Passover Seder from Judaism—Provides a Compelling Framework for Analyzing a self-proclaimed secular humanist’s prolific body of dispute resolution scholarship. Bear with me.

DOI: https://doi.org/10.37419/LR.V10.I1.2

* Professor of Law and Senior Fellow in the Dispute Resolution Institute, Mitchell Hamline School of Law.

The annual spring Passover holiday has been observed continuously for over 3,000 years, celebrating the liberation of a people from slavery in Egypt. The holiday gets its name from the story that the angel of death “passed over” the homes of the Jews during a night of a God-imposed plague on the first-born of Egypt. The crux of the holiday is the Seder—an elaborate ritual meal with many symbolic components to remind us “on the one hand, of the bitterness of slavery and, on the other, of the great joy of our liberation.” During the Seder, using a ritual guide known as the Haggadah, individuals tell, retell, reinvent constantly, and apply to new contexts the Passover story. Indeed, a central theme is the necessity for even the learned to tell the story, and by doing so, they “expand the frontiers of our freedom a little farther, since we understand that if we simply recite the story as a tale told about others, we can easily slip into being enslaved to the ‘pharaohs’ of our own creation.”

While “the learned” who expand upon the telling are considered “praiseworthy,” it is the children who are a key focus of the ritual.

1. See, e.g., Carrie Menkel-Meadow, And Now a Word About Secular Humanism, Spirituality, and the Practice of Justice and Conflict Resolution, 28 FORDHAM URB. L.J. 1073, 1075 (2001) [hereinafter Menkel-Meadow, Secular Humanism] (“My parents strongly rejected their own traditional religious birthrights and I was raised in the quasi-secular religious crucible of Ethical Culture in the religious ‘revival’ of the 1950s.”).

2. E.g., BEN M. E DIDIN, JEWISH HOLIDAYS AND FESTIVALS 131 (1940); see also MARTIN S ICKER, A PASSOVER SEDER COMPANION AND ANALYTIC INTRODUCTION TO THE HAGGADAH 2 (2004) (deeming it “self-evident that Passover is a commemoration of the liberation of the Israelites from bondage in Egypt, the central theme of the holiday therefore being the celebration of human freedom from oppression”); MICHAEL S TRASSFELD, THE JEWISH HOLIDAYS: A GUIDE AND COMMENTARY 5 (1985) (“The name Passover is taken from the Exodus story: [d]uring the tenth and ultimate plague inflicted on Pharaoh to break his will, God passed over the Israelites and struck down only the Egyptian firstborn. That night Pharaoh finally agreed to let the Israelites go; and ever since then, we gather together on that night to commemorate that time, and to contemplate the meaning of being freed by the ‘mighty hand and outstretched arm’ of the Holy One.”).

3. EDIDIN, supra note 2, at 134–35 (noting also that some scholars believe that Passover was celebrated even earlier as a spring Thanksgiving festival by a nomadic people tending to their flocks with respect to sheep and goats; the holiday was called “Pesach because this Hebrew word also means skipping, and refers, so some think, to the gamboling or skipping of the lambs and kids in the new pasture”).

4. STRASSFELD, supra note 2, at 8.

5. Id. (“Haggadah comes from the root meaning ‘to tell’ and reflects the purpose of the evening—the retelling of the story of the Exodus.”)

6. Id. at 7 (“At Passover we are commanded to tell the story of the Exodus. This commandment, unique to this holiday, leads us not simply to remember the Exodus but to expand upon the tale, to explore its complexities and develop its meaning.”).

7. Id. at 22.

8. Id.

9. Id. at 8 (describing Passover as a “family holiday because of the importance it places on conveying the story and meaning of Passover to the next generation”); see
IT'S IN THE “TELLING”

For example, the youngest child in a family is tasked with asking “The Four Questions” (all designed to help explain why this ritual night is different than other nights of the year).¹⁰ Later in the Haggadah, invoking biblical references to children’s understanding of the Exodus, comes a discussion of “The Four Children”—the wise child, the wicked child, the simple child, and the child who does not know.¹¹ There is no shortage of ruminations over the centuries to interpret the meaning of these archetypes of questioners, but a typical contemporary summary is that “each child is different and should be told the story on the level of his or her own understanding.”¹²

Why is any of this relevant to Menkel-Meadow’s work? It is not simply that, among her many writings, she authored the Old Testament-invoking “Ten Commandants of Appropriate Dispute Resolualso Sicker, supra note 2, at 34 (“[T]he focus of the Seder is on the instruction of the young, who were to be the first casualties of the oppressive designs against the Israelites that were conceived by Pharaoh and his ministers.”).

10. The questions (and answers) differ from Haggadah to Haggadah, but here is a typical example:

Why is this night different from all other nights? On all other nights we eat leavened products and matzah, and on this night only matzah. On all other nights we eat all vegetables, and on this night only bitter herbs. On all other nights, we don’t dip our food even once, and on this night we dip twice. On all other nights we eat sitting or reclining, and on this night we only recline.

11. For example, these archetypical children and their associated questions can be described as follows:

The wise child asks details about the specific meaning of the laws of Passover observance . . . . The wicked child asks, “Whatever does this mean to you?” . . . reminding us of the importance of not separating ourselves from our community or from traditions that might seem uncomfortable or foreign to us . . . . The simple child asks, “What does this mean?” to which a straightforward summary of the story is given, directly from the Torah: “It was with a mighty hand that God brought us out from Egypt, the house of bondage.” . . . In response to the child who does not know how to ask, we are instructed to “open it up” and explain, “It is because of what God did for me when I went free from Egypt” (Ex 13:8).

12. Strassfeld, supra note 2, at 22.
tion” (though they are wonderful). Nor is it the sheer prolific volume of her scholarship, which for anyone familiar with Passover immediately brings to mind one of the holiday’s most popular songs—Dayenu (“literally ‘it would have been enough’”).

Rather, there are five important themes that I will explore using Menkel-Meadow’s own words: First, she “tells” the dispute resolution story with a prolific number of questions. And questions, as noted above, are at the heart of the Passover Seder. Second, her commitment to process pluralism speaks to diverse constituencies—potentially reaching, to use the language of Passover, “all of the children.” Third, she is an exquisite, self-revealing storyteller and dedicated historian who has taken the long view on societal progress. Passover is, if nothing else, an annual history lesson—one that recognizes that true liberation is always aspirational, never complete; we must continually do the work. Fourth, she lives the journey of “theory-in-use” and has given us incredibly useful tools to apply in our day-to-day conflict resolution work, just as the symbolic rituals of Passover provide guidance throughout the year. Fifth, her scholarship is, at its core, fundamentally about justice, as is the Passover story of liberation.

The bottom line: Menkel-Meadow’s prolific dispute resolution scholarship does exactly what the Passover Seder aims each year to accomplish—making history accessible to a new generation “by teaching it in ways that lead to understanding, engagement, and action.”

An important disclaimer before going any further with the analysis: I am not an expert on Jewish tradition and instead rely on my own

14. Joshua Ratner, What Does “Dayenu” Mean Today?, MY JEWISH LEARNING (Apr. 1, 2014), https://www.myjewishlearning.com/2014/04/01/what-does-dayenu-mean-today/ [https://perma.cc/96X8-GZS3] (“Dayenu consists of 15 stanzas referencing different historical contexts the Israelites experienced, from slavery in Egypt to the building of the Temple in Israel. After each stanza, we sing the chorus, signifying that if this was the total of God’s miraculous intervention into the lives of the Israelites, it would have been sufficient.”).

15. See, e.g., Carrie Menkel-Meadow, What Is an Appropriate Measure of Litigation? Quantification, Qualification and Differentiation of Dispute Resolution, 11 Oñati Socio-Legal Series 320, 334 (2021) (Spain) [hereinafter Menkel-Meadow, What Is an Appropriate Measure of Litigation?], https://doi.org/10.35295/OSLS.HSL/0000-0000-0000-1146 (“We need process pluralism. Different disputants want different things from dispute resolution.”).

16. See, e.g., Carrie Menkel-Meadow, From Legal Disputes to Conflict Resolution and Human Problem Solving: Legal Dispute Resolution in a Multidisciplinary Context, 54 J. LEGAL EDUC. 7, 8 (2004) [hereinafter Menkel-Meadow, Legal Dispute Resolution in a Multidisciplinary Context] (“[M]y work in the field of dispute and conflict resolution has always been a movement back and forth from theory development to practice, seeking what Donald Schön has called ‘theory-in-use’ and what I have called ‘ethical practice’—practice that is informed by theory and by morally legitimate uses.”).

17. Intraub, supra note 11.
lived experience in the Jewish faith (one largely secular in its orientation). From my perspective, this is no liability; there is no better example of the process pluralism Menkel-Meadow praises than the myriad ways that people run Seders and tell the Passover story.

II. THE "TELLING" OF AN ENDURING ADR STORY

A. It's All About Questions

Isidor I. Rabi, the Nobel laureate in physics . . . was once asked, "Why did you become a scientist, rather than a doctor or lawyer or businessman, like the other immigrant kids in your neighborhood?" . . . [His answer]: "My mother made me a scientist without ever intending it. Every other Jewish mother in Brooklyn would ask her child after school: 'So? Did you learn anything today?' But not my mother. She always asked me a different question. 'Izzy,' she would say, 'did you ask a good question today?' That difference - asking good questions - made me become a scientist!—Donald Sheff

Questions abound in the Passover Seder, and children, in particular, are encouraged to ask them. As Michael Strassfeld summarizes it, "children give us insights into the meaning of freedom, because they take nothing for granted." They "are constantly questioning the hows and whys, and thereby make us reexamine our complacent explanations, which are often forms of subtle enslavement." That same type of constant questioning and challenge to the complacency of "brittle" adversarial thinking is the very heart of

18. Moreover, in the Menkel-Meadow spirit of self-revelation (see infra discussion accompanying notes 49–51. I feel compelled to share that my own organized religious experience was, to say the least, not inspiring. Among other things, the Rabbi of my early youth, Fred Neulander, was convicted of murder years after our studies concluded, confirming my youthful intuition that something was a "little off" in his spiritual guidance. See Fred Neulander, WIKIPEDIA, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Fred_Neulander [https://perma.cc/888P-VSFL].

22. STRASSFELD, supra note 2, at 32.

23. Id.

24. See, e.g., Menkel-Meadow, What Is an Appropriate Measure of Litigation?, supra note 15, at 320 (“Litigation, in some cases, produces too ‘brittle’ (binary) or costly outcomes, which is what led to the American ‘A’ (alternative/appropriate) Dispute Resolution movement.”); Carrie Menkel-Meadow, Toward a Jurisprudence of Law, Peace, Justice, and a Tilt Toward Non-Violent and Empathic Means of Human Menkel-Meadow’s ADR scholarship. She does not use questions simply as rhetorical devices. Rather, I see in them the legitimate curiosity of a mediator and problem-solving negotiator—a clear example of a scholar and clinician-practitioner “walking the walk.” The following is a sampling from over five decades of Menkel-Meadow’s scholarship:

1) The Twenty-Twenties

So what doctrines or policies can properly adjudicate the tensions between “too much or too little litigation” and personal choice and autonomy with respect to what should happen to legal claims? Should the harmed (plaintiffs) control how their cases are ultimately handled? When should our legal doctrines and policies trump individual desires and choices because of an important public “right to know” about relevant wrongdoing?

2) The Twenty-Tens

Do we need wise elders again? And if so, who should they be, how wise should they be and must they be elders?

Can dispute resolution theories and practices be ‘scaled up’ from dyadic negotiation or triadic mediation to whole polities and complex decision making in deliberative democracies (and elsewhere)?

What would it take to imagine a conception of law and justice that insists upon more than tolerance, but appreciation for difference, for recognition of our humanity, for care and rescue of those in need?

---

25. See ROBERT H. MOOKIN, SCOTT R. PEPPET & ANDREW S. TULLIMELLO, BEYOND WINNING: NEGOTIATING TO CREATE VALUE IN DEALS AND DISPUTES 58 (2000) (exhorting negotiators to “[b]e curious about the other side” and to always ask “[w]hat is the other side’s story, anyway?”); see also DOUGLAS STONE, BRUCE PATTON & SHEILA HEEN, DIFFICULT CONVERSATIONS: HOW TO DISCUSS WHAT MATTERS MOST 167 (1999) (describing the “[s]tance of [c]uriosity”).
26. Walk the Walk, CAMBRIDGE DICTIONARY, https://dictionary.cambridge.org/us/dictionary/english/walk-the-walk [https://perma.cc/P58R-SQZY] (defining “walk the walk” as “to show that something is true by your actions rather than your words”).
27. See Ratner, supra note 14.
need, and for healing and reintegrative or rehabilitative processes for other human beings.

3) The Aughts

How much should individual or group parties be able to craft their own arrangements or agreements to proceed with social, economic, and political life without consideration of the effects of their arrangements on others? If there is process pluralism, how are we to judge if the “proper” process has been chosen for the particular matter at hand?

What ought the role of the mediator to be? Facilitator of compromises? Active participant in morally constructed narratives? Peacemaker? Ceremonial healer? Should we eliminate mechanistic groundrules (e.g., turntaking, or no interruptions) to allow greater spiritual and more spontaneous feelings to be expressed?

Thus, we must always interrogate the purposes for which a process of dispute resolution is being invoked. How did this particular institution come to be? What values does it serve? Who is achieving what with the particular structure of the system in place?

4) The Nineties

What if, for example, we saw lawyers and the legal system seeking to solve not only client problems, but also seeking to work on community-based or even larger social problems? What if needs, as well as rights, were part of the lawyer’s vocabulary?

The question is not “for or against” settlement (since settlement has become the “norm” for our system), but when, how, and under what circumstances should cases be settled? When do our legal system, our citizenry, and the parties in particular disputes need formal legal adjudication, and when are their respective interests served by settlement, whether public or private?

Whether new forms of dispute resolution will transform the courts or whether, in a more likely scenario, the power of our adversarial system will co-opt and transform the innovations designed to re-

31. Menkel-Meadow, Toward a Jurisprudence of Law, supra note 24, at 101.
33. Menkel-Meadow, Secular Humanism, supra note 1, at 1086.
34. Carrie Menkel-Meadow, Mothers and Fathers of Invention: The Intellectual Founders of ADR, 16 OHIO ST. J. ON DISP. RESOL. 1, 11–12 (2000) [hereinafter Menkel-Meadow, Mothers and Fathers of Invention].
35. Menkel-Meadow, Ethics and Professionalism, supra note 13, at 159.
dress some, if not all, of our legal ills. Can legal institutions be changed if lawyers and judges persist in acting from traditional and conventional conceptions of their roles and values?37

5) The Eighties

What, in the aggregate, would our system of dispute resolution and transaction planning look like if problem solving were the more usual model? How would it affect the parties, the legal system and society?38

B. Process Pluralism That Speaks to “All of the Children”

Obviously, I am not happy with all of the developments and turns that ADR has taken. By opposing its mandatory, court-institutionalized forms, I find myself in an awkward position—considered by some to be an unmitigated apologist for ADR, and by others to be downright hostile to ADR.—Carrie Menkel-Meadow39

As Rabbi Sandi Intraub succinctly puts it, “[r]eciting The Four Children reminds us of the . . . obligation to teach the next generation about this powerful story, and, importantly, not to tell the story in the one way that might be easiest for us.”40 Rabbi Intraub goes on to suggest the following:

[W]e should invite our children to be a part of the conversation, strive to meet the children where they are individually, respect the way each one learns and interacts in the world, and respond accordingly and appropriately. . . . There is wisdom in the idea that we should “open it up” for the one who does not know how to ask. How can we find creative ways to open the story of Passover – with all its history, values, and relevance to today – to all those who are eager to learn?41

Arguably, Menkel-Meadow does exactly this. First, she is comfortable with complexity:

I have often thought myself ill-suited to my chosen profession. I love to argue, but I am often too quick to say both, “yes, I see your point” and concede something to the “other side,” and to say of my own arguments, “yes, but, it’s not that simple.” In short, I have trouble with polarized argument, debate, and the adversarialism

40. Intraub, supra note 11.
41. Id.
IT’S IN THE “TELLING”

that characterizes much of our work. Where others see black and white, I often see not just the “grey” but the purple and red—in short, the complexity of human issues that appear before the law for resolution.42

Second, she has been willing to both critique and endorse mediation and adjudication:

In my career, I have most often defended mediation against attacks made by the litigation romanticists who tend to see conventional adjudicative processes and the “rule of law” as the only measure of justice. Mediation offers an often better process, by providing direct party engagement, open dialogue unrestricted by rigid rules of evidence and the possibilities that parties can craft their own solutions. To the extent that this process has all too often restricted discussion of the past in its promise to “move forward constructively,” I now think it is time for us to reconsider some of our dogmas and doctrines to see whether mediation is as adaptive and fair as we have claimed.43

Despite my great support of ADR (and my practice of it too, as an arbitrator and mediator), I am not in favor of ending adjudication. Adjudication is necessary to generate rules and norms, and to exist as a final resort when the parties cannot resolve things themselves and require a particular kind of decisionmaker—whether judge or jury—each with its own logic, rationales, and functions within our judicial system.44

Third, she offers a persuasive message about process pluralism:

[T]here is no one right way forward. Rather, we need process pluralism, as well as different substantive commitments, to advance a society of true social justice and peace, with appreciation, empathy and sympathy for human differences and more varied modes of working and living together.45

42. Menkel-Meadow, Whose Dispute Is It Anyway?, supra note 36, at 2663; see also Carrie J. Menkel-Meadow, When Winning Isn’t Everything: The Lawyer as Problem Solver, 28 Hofstra L. Rev. 905, 911 (2000) [hereinafter Menkel-Meadow, When Winning Isn’t Everything] (“[T]he major theme of my life’s work has been to try to see and when others see only either/or, but a problem solving approach to legal issues does suggest other goals (joint-gain, acknowledging that the other party is part of the problem to be solved), which should produce different behaviors and different outcomes. Problem solving does not mean cooperation (cooperation must be earned—we do not simply give in to the other side) or unnecessary compromise.”).

44. Carrie Menkel-Meadow, Introduction: What Will We Do When Adjudication Ends? A Brief Intellectual History of ADR, 44 UCLA L. Rev. 1613, 1623 (1997) (“The interesting question for me, then, is not what will we do when adjudication ends, but when and how should we use adjudication and when should we use something else? And, must adjudication be structured the way it is?”).

45. Menkel-Meadow, Toward a Jurisprudence of Law, supra note 24, at 80; see also Carrie Menkel-Meadow, Do the “Haves” Come Out Ahead in Alternative Judicial Fourth, she does not shy away from the merits of compromise:

I have argued in many places that compromise is itself morally compelled. If we want to live peacefully on this earth, with all of our complexity, diversity, and differences, “we need to ‘give a little, to get a little.’”

We should learn to consider in the ethics of compromise not only when we should not compromise to preserve our integrity and basic principles but when we should compromise as a matter of human humility, fallibility, and the possibility that we may not be the only one who is morally, politically, or socially right.

C. A Self-Revealing Storyteller and Dedicated Historian Taking the Long View on Societal Progress

Sometimes in the shadowy evenings of “afterthoughts” or late-night gabfests at ADR conferences you can hear the whisper of people talking about how racial injustice, child or domestic abuse, divorce, alcoholism, the Holocaust, or religious intolerance in their past or families has motivated them to seek more productive ways to heal the flesh and hearts and minds torn by human cruelty. There is a story dwelling in the social and personal origins of those who labor in the dispute resolution field.—Carrie Menkel-Meadow

There is power in self-revealing. “At the seder,” writes Michael Strassfeld, “we must be telling our own story, our own experience. Telling the story of others is not enough. We must relive slavery and freedom, and we must question our values.” Unlike most academics, Menkel-Meadow remarkably has never shied away from self-disclosure. For example, she relayed the following:

I am the daughter of Holocaust survivors, both German, one Jewish, one Catholic, who arrived in the United States during the diaspora of the Second World War. Both of my parents were comfortable in Germany before their immigration and after some struggle and harrowing experiences, became “comfortable” again. But in my family, where the Holocaust was revisited constantly in conversation and

---

49. STRASSFELD, supra note 2, at 44.
IT’S IN THE “TELLING”

retelling of experiences, the conclusion was not to cling to our different religious traditions, but to see the harm that religious and racial “belonging” causes when difference and discrimination turn to hate and violence. For me, religious and racial divisions and differences meant horrific violence, and so my childhood was spent thinking about ways to reduce such human suffering.50

I am a white woman, daughter of Holocaust survivors, who, growing up with this family history in the 1950s, became a “race” conscious activist who heard and saw the damage that racial categories and exclusions could do to staggering numbers of people as well as to the spirit and material well-being of individuals and families. So as a young girl of a religiously mixed marriage, I was determined to spend my life working against racial discrimination and other forms of cruelty, intolerance, incivility, and injustice. Like many of my generation with these values, I went to law school and became a legal services and civil rights lawyer. . . . I knew that lawsuits were only one way, and seldom the best way, to solve problems or to “reorient people to each other.” For many of us in the New Left, the interpersonal and the psychological were also the political. As many in the women’s movement were, I was interested in how oppressive social forces and institutions of exclusionary privilege constructed both the public spaces and private places that controlled, enforced and limited our lives. Lawsuits and courts were “public spaces,” the everyday negotiations, interactions and “mediations” of social life were the more private places where people really did their work and lived their lives.51

She marries that self-revelation with the long view of the dedicated historian:

One of our greatest practitioners, John Paul Lederach has often reminded us that our field is a long multi-generational process – he can touch the hands of both his grandparents and grandchildren to see a span of over 100 years of human struggle with conflict – perhaps, little by little, each generation will learn from the one that went before.52

In reviewing these contributions of our intellectual forbearers, a question comes to mind. Is there nothing new under the sun? Can every new insight about dispute processes be traced to some earlier

50. Menkel-Meadow, Secular Humanism, supra note 1, at 1074–75.
52. Menkel-Meadow, Historical Contingencies, supra note 30, at 38; see also Jean R. Sternlight, Andrea Schneider, Carrie Menkel-Meadow, Robert Mnookin, Richard Goldstone & Penelope Andrews, Transcription, Making Peace with Your Enemy: Nelson Mandela and His Contributions to Conflict Resolution, 16 NEV. L.J. 281, 289 n.10 (2015) (praising Nelson Mandela for his ability to connect with the younger generation in South Africa and thereby “[d]emonstrating the importance of John Paul Lederach’s message that we in peace and justice work must touch the hands of our grandparents and grandchildren, peace and justice may require the span of three generations or one hundred years to accomplish”).
theorist, scholar, or empiricist? I think the answer to that question is that humans and legal scholars (sometimes co-extensive groups) do often “create” ideas without tracing their origins and considering what intellectual and social forces produce particular questions and answers at particular times. There may be no new questions to ask, but there are plenty of new situations and conditions against which to measure and re-consider pronouncements by earlier generations. In reviewing our mothers and fathers of invention in the field of dispute resolution, I am both awed by how much they have given us and challenged by how much has changed that requires new thinking on these old themes.53

This self-revealing, long-view historian also happens to be a superb storyteller, whether it be invoking the parable of who to bring on “the good camping trip” when advocating for the importance of “‘conflict resolver[s]’ or ‘process expert[s],’”54 or giving a speech to offer a devastating, succinct indictment of “mediation 2.0” as “mediation lite.”55

Disputes and conflicts are human constructs. We need theory to understand their causes, dynamics, and trajectories of actions and reactions, but ultimately we need practice to use conflict creatively and constructively, to make “justice” in legal terms and to make “peace” in human terms.—Carrie Menkel-Meadow56

While Passover is in part the telling of history, it is also a guide to living life today. As Strassfeld puts it:

53. Menkel-Meadow, Mothers and Fathers of Invention, supra note 34, at 37.
55. Menkel-Meadow, Mediation 3.0, supra note 29, at 7. With respect to “mediation 2.0,” Menkel-Meadow offers this insight:
The truth is for us in the US, mediation 2.0 has a very bad name. We call it “mediation lite.” Mediation lite is what happened when some courts decided it is a very good idea to have mediation and they made everyone attend mediation without any regulation at all of who the mediators would be or what they should do. No wise elders - we had lots of unwise youngers doing mediation. They were people who thought it was a lovely way to make peace in the world and they had wonderful intentions but they did not know what they were doing and so people were ordered to show up at hearings or go to mediation without any clear purpose about what was intended. And so, what was supposed to be remembered as pure mediation - a voluntary process of self-determination and communication - became compelled and mandatory. And our judges then had to decide if the parties were there with good faith and intentions and if they were not, they got fined - there were penalties and things happened to them. And so, we begin to get formal rules and the requirement that one had to go to mediation before litigation.

Id.

[E]ven if we think we know all the details of the story, we must retell it to remind ourselves not only that freedom is possible but that in an unredeemed world we must continue to strive for liberation in both personal and national ways. And whoever elaborates on the story—that is, whoever understands that the story is not just about a Pharaoh way back then or even the modern Pharaohs of our day, but about all the different ways we can be enslaved—he or she is deserving of praise.57

Similarly, Menkel-Meadow tells the history and gives us practical tools to navigate our own conflict resolution challenges. Like Mary Parker Follet (who Menkel-Meadow praised as “one of the leading ‘mothers’ of invention in ADR”58), Menkel-Meadow has herself carried on the grand tradition of marrying theory and practice. The fruits of that marriage benefit those who teach dispute resolution. Indeed, each year, in a ritual of my own (reminiscent of the annual cycle of Passover), I challenge incoming law students with the cogent wisdom of three invaluable Menkel-Meadow lists: 1) her criteria for the evaluation of approaches to negotiation, authored in 1984;59 2) her “re-thinking IRAC” recommendations, authored in 1999;60 and 3) her

57. STRASSFELD, supra note 2, at 37.
58. Menkel-Meadow, Mothers and Fathers of Invention, supra note 34, at 7.
59. Menkel-Meadow, Toward Another View, supra note 38, at 760–61. As relevant today as ever before, Menkel-Meadow listed the following criteria:
   1. Does the solution reflect the client’s total set of “real” needs, goals and objectives, in both the short and the long term?
   2. Does the solution reflect the other party’s full set of “real” needs, goals and objectives, in both the short and long term?
   3. Does the solution promote the relationship the client desires with the other party?
   4. Have the parties explored all the possible solutions that might either make each better off or one party better off with no adverse consequences to the other party?
   5. Has the solution been achieved at the lowest possible transaction costs relative to the desirability of the result?
   6. Is the solution achievable, or has it only raised more problems that need to be solved? Are the parties committed to the solution so it can be enforced without regret?
   7. Has the solution been achieved in a manner congruent with the client’s desire to participate in and affect the negotiation?
   8. Is the solution “fair” or “just”? Have the parties considered the legitimacy of each other’s claims and made any adjustments they feel are humanely or morally indicated?

Id.

60. Carrie Menkel-Meadow, Taking Problem Solving Pedagogy Seriously: A Response to the Attorney General, 49 J. LEGAL EDUC. 14, 15 (1999). Menkel-Meadow suggested the following supplementary considerations:

Imagine if the teacher (and the student, while briefing a case) asked not only the usual IRAC questions but the following additional questions.
- What brought these parties/clients to a lawyer? What were they trying to accomplish?
- What were their underlying needs or interests, in their actual experience and as expressed to the lawyer? What translation occurs by both client brilliant 420-word summary of eight major precepts from our field’s intellectual founders, authored in 2000.61 In my view, these three lists and lawyer when they first address each other across the legal-issue-spotting divide?

- What were the likely/possible needs or interests of the other parties involved in the case—the actual adversaries, other possible litigants, or involved parties who may not have been joined?
- What is really at stake? Scarce commodities, reputation, or legal principles? Some harm or hurt not traditionally considered compensable?
- How would you evaluate the legal, social, economic, political, psychological, moral, or ethical risks and benefits of litigation? Of nonlitigated outcomes?
- What other resolutions/transactions/arrangements might have better dealt with this “case” or “problem” than the court’s resolution?
- Are there other processes that might have led to different/better/worse outcomes?

Id.

61. Menkel-Meadow, Mothers and Fathers of Invention, supra note 34, at 36–37.
Menkel-Meadow’s succinct summary listed the following eight precepts:

1. Conflict can be good and a potential source of creativity. It is not always to be resolved or squelched. Conflict handled appropriately can put the parties (and the rest of us) in a better position than we were before or than we might be in if left to our own devices (or litigation).

2. Good resolutions of conflicts and problems in the law can occur when people realize that valuing different things differently is good. Money need not be a proxy for everything, an assumption that can lead to bitter zero-sum games and distributive or unnecessary compromise outcomes. More issues and more trades enhance the likelihood of both the number and quality of possible resolutions.

3. Different dispute resolution processes produce different kinds of outcomes. Where there is a need for a decision, with a reasoned and reported basis, adversarial argumentation may be more important to framing the resolution. Where there is more than one party or more than one issue (“polycentric” disputes), however, single decision outcomes may not be wise, and mediation, or a negotiated consensus, rather than a single issue, externally imposed decision may be better.

4. Settlements or mediated solutions do not have to be compromises or “split the difference” outcomes. By exploring different values and underlying interests, creative solutions and integrative outcomes may be possible.

5. Institutionalized choices about processes facilitate an appropriate range of public and private participation in different kinds and levels of matters and may legitimate both individual cases and the larger legal and political system in which those cases are handled. Different dispute institutions will have their own special competencies, expertises, and morality for handling particular kinds of matters, which may change over time, developing a kind of “process integrity.”

6. Processes produce different kinds of outcomes—there are no universal processes that will always be better, fairer, or more efficient than others. Dispute processes are part of the larger culture in which they are embedded and also help create a community’s sense of self. Different kinds of disputes will call for different kinds of “handling,” “managing,” or “resolution.”

7. Variations and choices in processes used to resolve particular matters or to plan future arrangements or transactions in a society are likely to increase participation in and legitimacy of the outcomes reached.

8. The human conditions under which peaceful collaboration and cooperation versus conflict and aggression exist are variable, and we continue to
2022] IT’S IN THE “TELLING”

are a modern-day Haggadah (“ritual guide”)\(^\text{62}\) of ADR.

E. It’s All About Justice

Can peace be achieved without justice? Can justice be achieved without peace? Is law a proper measure of justice? If not law, what is?—Carrie Menkel-Meadow\(^\text{63}\)

As a ritual holiday centered on liberation from slavery, Passover is easily connected to the concept of justice.\(^\text{64}\) The “Passover story serves as a model for any struggle for freedom” and reminds us that “[t]hings do not always have to remain as they are” and that “radical change is possible.”\(^\text{65}\)

Menkel-Meadow likewise challenges us to change. She has advocated forcefully to expand the lawyer’s role in pursuing justice:

> Because I believe justice is bigger and more complex than both “legal justice” and legal ethics, and includes a set of values in addition to those commonly associated with legal justice, the lawyer’s role in “pursuing justice” must expand to pursuing other forms of actions—including peace-seeking, consensus-building and problem-solving, as well as our more conventional roles of advocacy and representation.\(^\text{66}\)

She has asked us to consider, Can we “marry old conceptions of determining what is ‘right’ or ‘wrong’ (justice) with what it might take to forge more complex, diversified and contingent relationships with others for mutual cooperation and co-existence (peace)?”\(^\text{67}\) She has suggested that “the key to understanding the appropriateness of any negotiation process is whether justice is ill-served by the processes the parties choose, be they public litigation or private negotiation.”\(^\text{68}\) Finally, in eulogizing her dear friend and colleague Trina Grillo, need more theory and more practice to elaborate when we mortal actors can influence each other’s behavior.

Id.

62. See supra discussion accompanying note 5.

64. Sicker, supra note 2, at 2 (suggesting that “the central theme of the holiday . . . is the celebration of human freedom from oppression”).

65. Strassfeld, supra note 2, at 36.

66. Carrie Menkel-Meadow, Practicing “in the Interests of Justice” in the Twenty-First Century: Pursuing Peace as Justice, 70 FORDHAM L. REV. 1761, 1767 (2002); see also, Carrie Menkel-Meadow, The Lawyer As Consensus Builder: Ethics for a New Practice, 70 TENN. L. REV. 63, 112 (2002) (opining that lawyers serve justice when they strive for peace and develop “the skills and the ethical commitments to attempt to make social, legal, political, and economic problems more amenable to democratic, creative, and life-enhancing resolutions that include more active participation by more of the people affected by decisions made and actions taken”).

Menkel-Meadow gave us a powerful definition for the socially committed mediator—"she listened, she talked, she asserted and did not 'consent' to oppression or injustice."

III. Conclusion

Passover reminds us annually that no matter how terrible our situation, we must not lose hope. Passover holds out the possibility of renewal, proclaiming that such change is as intrinsic to human nature as are blossoming trees to the natural world.—Michael Strassfeld

“The Seder,” wrote Ben Edidin, “has everything—ceremony, songs and stories, games and pranks, good food and drink.” According to Edidin, “it is a pageant with every one taking part, re-enacting the ancient story of liberation, reminding the Jew of his eventful history, and rekindling hope for the future.”

Menkel-Meadow’s scholarship likewise offers relentless optimism, hope, and faith for the future. As she wrote in 2001:

As a member of the Ethical Culture Society, and as a member of the human race, I still believe that “god” is spelled with two “o’s.” What that means in lawyering and conflict resolution practice remains to be elaborated. The challenge will be to see whether we can join pursuit of connection, communion, and collective meaning with autonomy, self-determination, and justice. Good conflict resolution practice recognizes that when ADR works, our knowledge and understanding transcend different conceptions of facts, interpretations, and meaning-making systems. We find value in the valuing of our fellow human beings.

In 2012–2013, she summarized her own work as “focused on developing legal and other processes that encourage the ‘best’ in us to seek creative, less rigid, more contingent, and more tailored solutions to a wide variety of human problems that wind up in the legal system or become sources of serious human strife, hostility and war.” She challenged us to consider, “[f]rather than preventing us from being bad, how can we encourage ourselves to be better human beings?”

Earlier this year, having emerged out of the Trumpian end of the 2010s, during which she penned the only pessimistic note I could find in her scholarship (including a delightful thought experiment), she expressed her hope that “we have enough time left to learn how to really listen, explore our needs and interests and search for solutions that enhance human flourishing, rather than diminish it” and guessed that “the optimist in me is still hopeful.”
2022] IT’S IN THE “TELLING” 41

It turns out she is not only an optimist, but also is an enthusiastic, self-identified embracer of food metaphors in scholarly writing. This is especially low-hanging fruit joyfully picked when, as I have tried here, analogizing her writing to a ritual-based meal. There are many examples, but these are my favorites, from 2000 and 2013, respectively:

Thus, a good legal problem solver needs a greater repertoire of intellectual choices or “tropes” as well as a much broader and deeper set of behaviors. (Note, I did not say more arrows in the quiver, tools in the chest, or weapons in the arsenal—all terms of military destruction. How about, instead, more spices or ingredients for a more flavorful meal? More human diversity for a greater source of ideas?).

[T]he ultimate challenge of the future of conflict resolution study and practice is our need to combine different kinds of discourses into productive engagement with each other – the combinations of the human brain (head), heart, and yes, ‘gut.’ To live together, with productive conflict engagement, we need to think about, feel with, and get along with, tolerate (dare I say ‘digest’) other human beings, whose land, water and air we must share, even if we do not ultimately share all our values of what is most important in life.

RESOL. 5, 7 (“I have written about the dangers of brittle adversarial thinking and behavior in the legal system and polity for decades, now seemingly to little avail.”).

77. Id. at 25 (“I do experiments in my head to try to imagine how Donald Trump and some of his supporters would do in a ‘healing circle,’ negotiated rule-making, facilitated strategic planning exercise for the West Wing, family mediation, or simply a ‘brainstorming’ Cabinet meeting, and I can’t even conjure up a good fantasy movie. As Charles Dickens famously said, ‘it was the worst of times’ (I am leaving out ‘the best of times’), for us, at least at the national policy implementation level.”) (footnote omitted).

78. Menkel-Meadow, Hyper-Polarization, supra note 46, at 3.

79. Menkel-Meadow, Legal Dispute Resolution in a Multidisciplinary Context, supra note 16, at 19 (“At the level of searching for creative ways to manage conflict, to seek integrative solutions, and to create pie-expanding rather than pie-diminishing solutions (I use many food metaphors in my work!), the early work of administrative scientist Mary Parker Follett and related work in labor-management relations were key.”); see also Menkel-Meadow, Hyper-Polarization, supra note 46, at 3 (“If we do not learn to make lemonade out of lemons together, our lives will be quite bitter-sweet. . . . I thank Heidi [Burgess], Guy [Burgess], and Sanda [Kaufman] for giving us some recipes.”).

80. Menkel-Meadow, When Winning Isn’t Everything, supra note 42, at 910.

81. Menkel-Meadow, Historical Contingencies, supra note 30, at 41.
It is a full and immensely satisfying meal to digest Menkel-Meadow’s entire body of dispute resolution scholarship. In final reflection on the feast, I close with this: A year ago, when writing a book chapter commentary about one of Menkel-Meadow’s early journal articles, I deemed it foundational because it was prescient. In reflecting on the entire body of her work, I have a different perspective. Her scholarship is foundational and destined to inspire future generations of dispute resolution theorists and practitioners because it tells such a hopeful dispute resolution story that speaks to all. And that, in the spirit of the Passover Seder, is the true measure of passing down foundational knowledge. A successful “telling” indeed.

82. I offer my heartfelt thanks to the Texas A&M School of Law Symposium planners for the invitation to the feast and remain, as I have always been, in awe of the cook!